EUROPE

The Coming Trial of Prince Bonaparte—The Troubles in Paris—The Emperor and the Pope's Nuncio—Why M. Pascalet is Not Appointed Minister.

PARIS, Feb. 19.—The decision of the High Court, published to-day in the newspapers, is more serious than was reported before. By the order of the Court, dated on the 19th of February, 1870, PIERRE NAPOLEON BONAPARTE is to be judged—first, for having committed homicide on the person of VICTOR NOIR, and that this was preceded or followed by an attempt on the person of ULRICH FONVIELLE; second, for having attempted the homicide of FONVIELLE. This order places the Prince under article 301 of the penal code, the punishment being death. In case of extenuating circumstances the Court can lessen the sentence by two degrees. It is reported to-day that the sessions of the High Court will be held at Tours, in the Department of Indre et Loire....It is reported that the Prefect of the Police will not allow the usual street parades on Shrove Tuesday. (Mardi-gras)....The Magistrates are engaged every day examining the prisoners arrested during the late troubles....The Emperor has had several meetings with the Papal Nuncio on the subject of protestations against the Syllabus. ....The remonstrances of unemployed diplomats being M. PREVOST PARADOL'S appointment as Minister to Washington.

The Carlist Movement in Spain—Letter from the Duke Montpensier—The Prussian Parliament—Bismarck's Policy Attacked—Bavaria.

LISBON, Feb. 19.—The Carlist Committees are vigorously at work, and have lately extended their operations to the Spanish frontier. Emissaries from Spain and other countries are arriving every day. They are generally well supplied with money.

MADRID, Feb. 19.—General RAMON CABRERA, the distinguished Carlist leader, refuses to take command of the Carlist movement unless recruit forces are organized and a basis of operations decided upon....The Imparcial says several Carlist chiefs have recently left France and entered the north of Spain....The newspapers today print a letter from the Duke of MONTPENSIER, who declares that Spain is his country by tradition, adoption and affection.

BERLIN, Feb. 19.—The Reichstag has been the scene of animated discussions during the past few days, on the policy of Count VON BISMARCK. He was bitterly attacked by many of the members....The old officers of the North Parliament have been collected.

MUNICH, Feb. 19.—It is rumored to-day that F. VON GREGER, at present Minister of Public Instruction, will succeed Prince HOHENLOHE SCHILLINGSFURST as President of the Ministry.

The New Irish Land Bill—Continued Opposition of the Irish Press—Report of Consul Archibald on the American Tariff—The Spectator on Canada and the Chinese Treaty.

LONDON, Feb. 19.—The Saturday Review of to-day notes approvingly the acceptance of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Land Reform bill, by the Irish members of the Commons. The writer thinks the Irish people will also accept it, unpalatable though it may be, as the first installment of reform....The Irish national Press continue to denounce the new Land bill....The Pall Mall Gazette this evening publishes copious extracts of the recent Consular report made to the Government by Mr. EDWARD M. ARCHIBALD, the British Consul at New-York. That gentleman says the high tariff on the raw material prevents the export of American manufactures. The West is dissatisfied with the tariff, but owing to the powerful lobby of the Eastern manufacturers, it is unable to work a reform, consequently the shipping, the agricultural and all the other interests of the country are sacrificed. A tardy, gradual reduction of the tariff is all that can be hoped for. ....The Spectator, in an editorial to-day, thinks England might let Canada be independent, but the country is as reluctant to surrender her empire as the United States was to surrender the Southern Confederacy. In another article on the treaty lately concluded by Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK with the Chinese Government, the fear is expressed that that gentleman has sacrificed the opium revenue to secure other trade privileges with China....The rowing match between SADLER and HEAVY has been postponed until Monday, the 28th inst., on account of the extreme cold weather.

CANADA

A Deadlock in the New-Brunswick Legislature—Newfoundland Adverse to Confederation.

ST. JOHN, N. B., Feb. 19.—The Government are at a deadlock with the Legislative Council because the former has dismissed Mr. BOTSFORD, who has been for many years Clerk to the Council, and the Council refuse to recognize the right of the Government to dismiss their officers and have retained Mr. BOTSFORD in his position. The Government propose Mr. BOTSFORD of annexation sentiments, and say that he owes the Provincial Treasury a large sum of money. A committee of the Legislative Council have reported that they consider the Governor-General as the only representative of Her Majesty in the Dominion, and as Mr. BOTSFORD holds his commission direct from the Crown, they regard the action of the Government as illegal....The Newfoundland House of Assembly has agreed to a paragraph in reply to the Lieutenant-Governor's reference to confederation with Canada. It declares that there is a growing feeling of dissatisfaction at the darkness of Newfoundland with those of the Dominion, in the future of which they can at present see nothing to inspire hope, but much to create apprehension.

The Mismanagement at Annapolis—Recreation of Boat Officers by the Secretary of the Navy and the Governor of Maryland—Legislative Action.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Feb. 19.—Her British Majesty's ship Monarch arrived off Annapolis at 7:30 o'clock last evening and anchored six miles out, where she now lies. At 10:30 o'clock this morning Captain COURMENEY, Governor CHAMBERLAIN, of Maine, and Captains WOOD and McPANE of the British Legation, came ashore, and were received by Secretary ROBESON, of the Navy, and Commodore WORDEN, Superintendent of the Naval Academy. The party, with the exception of Secretary ROBESON, then called upon Governor BOWIE, and were entertained at the Governor's house. The heads of the bureaus of the Navy Department are expected to visit the ship some day next week. The Maryland Senate to-day appointed a Committee to invite the President of the United States and the Judges of the Supreme Court to the floor of the Legislature on the occasion of their visit to the Monarch.

THE PACIFIC COAST

The Chinese in California—Rumors of an Expedition—Plan—Improvement of Midway Island Harbor.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 19.—There are vague rumors of an expedition in this city for the purpose of exterminating the Chinese residents on or before St. Patrick's Day. The attention of the authorities has been called to the matter. There are said to be several associations, one of which alone numbers 2,000 members. Brutal assaults on the Mongolians are of daily occurrence here.....Carefully compiled statistics, presented to the Legislature recently, place the number of Chinese on the Pacific coast at 60,000.....The schooner Kate Fiser cleared to-day, with materials for blasting away the coral reef at the entrance of the harbor of Midway Island, to make an available coaling station for the China and Government steamers.

THE WEST.

Extreme Cold Weather—A Party of Six Soldiers Probably Froze to Death on the Plains—Other Deaths from Exposure Reported.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 19.—A letter received in this city from Fort Abercrombie, says that Friday, the 11th inst., there was the most tempestuous storm on the Plains experienced this Winter. On that day CHARLES WARNER, in company with six soldiers and an Indian scout, left Fort Ransom for Abercrombie. The soldiers and scout were soon left behind, and Mr. WARNER heard no more of them until Saturday evening. While stopping at a station on the route, the scout came in badly frozen and hardly able to talk. He reported that the day previous he got lost in the driving storm, and unhitching his mules, had camped out upon the prairie, all of the party being more or less frozen. The Indian covered four of the soldiers in the snow, the other two preferring to remain in the open sleigh. He then started for assistance, and traveled that night and all the next day. He finally arrived at the station, but so badly frozen and exhausted as to have no clear idea where the soldiers were left buried. His tracks having been covered by the drift, it was impossible to follow them back, and no search was made for the missing men, and they are probably all dead. The same day two men, chopping wood near Alexandria, were lost and have not since been heard of.

THE RECENT STORM.

Reports of Disasters to the East—Great Freshets—Travel Impeded—Its Effects in Other Sections.

LEWISTON, Me., Feb. 19.—The severest gale experienced here for many years occurred yesterday. The wind was furious until late in the night, and it has raised continuously for twenty-four hours. The melting of two feet of snow contributed to swell the flood, which has submerged the culverts and highways. On the Androscoggin Railroad a portion of the bridge at Farmington, and a small bridge at Wilton have been carried away, and the trains will not be able to get through till Monday.

CONCORD, N.H., Feb. 19.—The storm cleared off early this morning, and at noon the thermometer indicated 20° above zero. Heavy thunder showers were reported north of here early this morning. The night train over the Northern Road was detained for two hours by the washing of earth upon the rails in several places. The Suncook Valley Road is washed so as to prevent the running of the trains. The Merrimack River is rising fast, but it has cleared off cold, and it is not apprehended that the river will rise high enough to cause damage.

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—A dispatch from Concord, N. H., says there is a great freshet in the upper Connecticut Valley and immense damage is being done. The large bridge over that river in the town of Lancaster has been carried away, also several barns, &c. Great alarm prevails among the people of the valley, and many families are leaving their houses for safety... Last night's train from New-York did not arrive here until about 1:30 o'clock this afternoon, owing to the washing of the track by the heavy rain of last night.

ALBANY, N. Y., Feb. 19.—No material damage was done by the storm here last night. The river, which threatened a freshet, has receded below the docks, and is clear of ice from Troy to Catskill.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 19.—Two dwelling houses on Christina-street were shattered by lightning during the storm last night, but the inmates were not injured.

CHICAGO, Feb. 19.—A snow storm has prevailed nearly all day, accompanied by a fierce wind. So far no interruption has occurred to railroads, although the snow drifts badly as fast as it falls. It is very cold.

CRIMES AND CRIMINALS.

Murders in Arkansas and West Virginia—Shooting Case in the Philadelphia Streets—A Dishonest Post Office Clerk—Sentence of Murderers at Rochester, N. Y., and Newark, N. J.

MEMPHIS, Feb. 19.—CALVIN C. CLARK, of Bell County, Texas, was murdered in Clark County, Arkansas, on the 6th inst., by the notorious desperado named SAM. HALSEY. CLARK had assisted the Sheriff of Bell County, Texas, in arresting a gang of desperadoes to which HALSEY belonged. During the arrest one of the gang was killed. CLARK then started to move to Little Rock, but was followed by HALSEY, who shot him down while he was riding by the wagon containing his family, who recognized the assassin. Large rewards have been offered for HALSEY by the Governors of Missouri, Texas and Arkansas.

WHEELING, West Va., Feb. 19.—This morning RICHARD MCCRACKEN stabbed FRANK MOUNTS to the heart. MCCRACKEN was arrested and confined in the lockup, but escaped during the night and has not yet been recaptured. The affair grew out of an altercation in regard to the use of livery. MCCRACKEN was under the influence of liquor.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 19.—JOHN C. CRONIN was shot in the groin and dangerously wounded during a dispute in the street with a stranger about Fenianism last night.

BALTIMORE, Md., Feb. 19.—ROBERT DALE, a clerk in the Baltimore Post Office, was arrested this morning on a charge of stealing letters from the office, and committed to jail in default of $5,000 bail.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Feb. 19.—In the Court of Oyer and Terminer this morning, PATRICK HERMAN, convicted of murder in the second degree, was sentenced to the State Prison for life.

JOHN DOYLON, aged 21 years, convicted of murder in the second degree, was sentenced to the State Prison for life, and his wife CATHARINE, sentenced to the same offense, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. EDWARD DONERY, convicted of manslaughter, was sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

NEWARK, N. J., Feb. 19.—LEONHARDT SCHWURZ, convicted of the murder of CONRAD STRAIT, was to-day sentenced to twenty years in the State Prison. ROSANNA ROGERS, for manslaughter, was sentenced to five months in the County Jail.

Indian Reports Received at the Government Bureau—Dissatisfaction Among the Pacifics—The Condition of the Umatilla Tribe.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19.—Official information to the Indian Office is to the effect that some little dissatisfaction is felt among a few of the Pacific Indians, of New-Mexico, owing to the small amount of goods issued to them. They say they have not received a single article from the Government, in the shape of presents, for the past twenty years, and they think they are entitled to more than they are now receiving. The opinion of their agent, however, is that they are receiving sufficient. They have been self-supporting for a long while, and any presents from the Government, except books and other necessary articles for schools, would tend to make them feel that the Government was inclined to support them, and lead them to expect more than is absolutely necessary....Reports to the Department from the Umatilla Indian Agency, Oregon, state that the Indians are very peaceable, and their general health is remarkably good.

State Legislatures—Indian Suffrage in Michigan—The Poll Tax and Suffrage in Tennessee.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 19.—In the lower House of the Missouri Legislature to-day a concurrent resolution was offered looking to Indian suffrage, and instructing the Senators and requesting Representatives in Congress to move in that direction.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Feb. 19.—The House of Representatives to-day rejected the resolution, by a large majority, declaring the provision of the Constitution adopted by the State Convention requiring the prepayment of the poll tax before exercising the right of suffrage, an infringement upon the rights of Tennessee.

Miscellaneous Telegrams.

BALTIMORE, Md., Feb. 19.—Yesterday, while a colored boy named WM. COOK, and two younger boys were playing at hinging in a hay-loft, the former stood upon a bale of hay and placed a halter about his neck. The other boys left the place for a few minutes, and on their return found that COOK had stepped or fallen off the bale of hay, and hanged himself. When the body was taken down life was quite extinct.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 19.—A fire at Minier, McLean County, Ill., destroyed the large country store of BALLENTINE & BARBOE, and several other buildings. Loss about $40,000; insured for $20,000 in sums in the Merchants' and Phenix Companies at Hartford, the Home Company at New-York and the Security at New-York.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 19.—J. J. REYNOLDS, the Military Commander of the Fifth Military District, Texas, in a private letter received here, declines to permit the use of his name in connection with the United States Senate.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Feb. 19.—The express freight train due here from Boston at 11:35 o'clock last night, was thrown from the track at Wilbraham, which will account for the delay of the evening trains. One man was slightly injured by the accident.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., Feb. 19.—A Mrs. SHAW, a deck passenger on the steamer Cairo, was caught in the machinery and Friday night, last week, and crushed to death.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 19.—A heavy land slide occurred at Plum Point, on the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad, to-day. Passenger travel was obstructed, and passengers were conveyed to Fishkill depot in hacks.

CHEYENNE, W. T., Feb. 19.—Acting-Governor LEE has appointed Mrs. CAROLINE FISK and Mrs. ESTHER MONROE Justices of the Peace for Sweetwater County, Wyoming.

ALBANY, Feb. 19.—Notice has been given by the employers that the wages of bricklayers, plasterers and stonecutters will be reduced March 1, and the workmen have resolved to strike.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 19.—JAMES W. HEATH, City Registrar, and an old and highly respected citizen, died to-day.

A Mystery at Sea—Anxiety for the Safety of the "City of Boston."

The steamer City of Boston, which left this port on the 29th of January and cleared at Halifax on the 8th for Liverpool, has not been heard from yet, and naturally some anxiety is felt by parties directly interested with regard to her fate. This has been painfully increased by a report that Captain HACKETT, of the schooner Charles Pepper, which arrived at Halifax on the 6th instant, saw a steamer off Sable Island throwing signals of distress, but was unable to go to her assistance. This vessel was supposed at first to be the City of Boston, which belongs to the Inman line, and the New-York agents proceeded to send to her relief, thinking she might yet be aground on the island. Before doing so, however, they telegraphed to Halifax for further particulars, and received the following reply from the Company's agents in that City:

HALIFAX, N. S., Feb. 14.

To J. G. Pale, No. 15 Broadway, N. Y.:

Captain HACKETT, of schooner Chas. Pepper, from Glace Bay for Boston, reports on the morning of the 31st of January, weather moderate and the night clear; did sightings was in latitude 40° 50' North, and longitude about 60° West. The schooner was then under reefed foresail, and was heading east and northwest, and was then without a rudder, having a derrick and jib. The Captain was alone on deck, and saw a white light ahead, about a mile off, which at first he took for a star, but afterwards found to be the masthead light of a steamer, he then saw the port light on her starboard side, then saw the three lights right astern; saw no other lights, and the steamer was passing from the lights. She appeared to be going about four or five knots. It was a large vessel, with three masts; cannot say whether she was ship rigged; she then was about a mile off the bow, and he could see the white light and starboard light, and was then about a point on my port bow about north; she threw up three rockets of different colors, I think first white, second yellow, third red; she was steering north, on a course from north to northwest; she was in sight about three hours. J. A. H. R. SUTTON.

This is regarded by the agents as conclusive against the supposition that the vessel in distress was the City of Boston, as she must have been far beyond Sable Island at the time, and Captain HACKETT would not have had sight of, as were observed by Captain HACKETT. It may have been one of the steamers of the Canadian line from Portland, which left port on the 29th and has signals like those described. On the other hand the City of Boston may have been delayed by any one of a variety of common accidents and no alarm is felt as yet for her ultimate safety.

Round Turn Sections.

The extraordinary feat of setting 2,064 ems of solid minion type in one hour was accomplished yesterday by Mr. GEORGE ARMSBRUST, a TIMES compositor. The trial of speed was the result of a wager that Mr. ARMSBRUST could not set four sticks of solid minion in sixty minutes. The first stick was set up in 16:30, the second in 13:30, the third in 14 minutes, and the fourth in 14:15—an average of 14 minutes to the stick, or 86 minutes altogether. Wishing to see what he could do in the hour, Mr. ARMSBRUST kept on, and the result was 16 ems more, or 2,064 ems altogether. To serve as an estimate of the extent of this undertaking, let the reader count off a line of the type in which the "Current Literature" of this morning's TIMES is printed. This is without question the fastest typ-setting feat on record. Mr. ARMSBRUST lately challenged Mr. GEORGE A. BARNES, of Cincinnati, for $500 a side, but was unable to get on a match.

The Cherry-Street Fire—Amount of the Losses and Insurance.

The losses by the great fire in Cherry-street Friday night, by which the Union Rice Mills of JOHN FITZGERALD were destroyed, were somewhat over estimated, but are still greatly in excess of the insurance. The loss on machinery is $60,000, and on stock $4,000, both of which fell upon Mr. FITZGERALD. His insurance is $20,000 on machinery and $8,000 on stock. The engine and boilers belonged to A. T. BENDIX, owner of the building, and were insured for $8,000 in the Home of New-York, and $1,500 each in the Metropolitan and Atlantic. The building was valued at $40,000, and insured for $30,000, as follows: Home of New-Haven, $2,000; Westchester County, $2,000; Metropolitan, $2,000; Lafayette, $2,000; Merchants of Providence, $2,000; Hoffman, $2,000; Farmers' of Providence, $1,000; Republic of Chicago, $1,000; Mechanics' and Traders', $2,000. The tenement building, West Street and 24 Cherry-street, owned by Mr. BENDIX, and valued at $40,000, was damaged to the amount of $4,000, by water and the falling wall of the marble mill, and is insured in Mechanics' and Traders' Company for $8,000.

EUROPEAN NEWS BY MAIL.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP MAIN.

The steamship Main, which left Bremen Feb. 5, and Southampton Feb. 6, reached this port yesterday. Her advices are later by two days than were those as hand by the Cuba.

The Globe learns that Mr. AUSTIN, an American millionaire, and the representative of an eminent American shipbuilding firm, has agreed to purchase Deptford Dockyard for $1,000,000.

The Scotsman is announced of Mrs. BERRY, the widow of the celebrated actor JOHN BERRY, whom she survived forty-eight years, and mother of Mr. SAMUEL BERRY, of the Olympic Theatre. Mrs. BERRY was in her 96th year.

The Figaro has made a curious discovery. M. ROCHEFORT, the Republican Socialist, the chief of Belleville, is said to be the same person as the Count HENRI DE ROCHEFORT DE LUCAY, who, in 1831, wrote to FRANCIS II., then besieged in Gaeta, to place his sword at the service of Legitimacy. The fact is said to have been divulged by the Duke DE SAN-CESARIO, who opened the letter in his quality of Private Secretary to the ex-King.

The Florence Nazione announces that it is to be prosecuted for publishing a recent letter of MAZZINI, in which he declined an invitation sent to him by some French Republicans to attend a dinner, at St. Maude, on the anniversary of the death of LOUIS XVI. In this letter some of the well-known political views of the writer found expression, and the Nazione by merely reproducing those views, is placed in exactly the position it would occupy had it adopted them.

The Beobachter Gazette of St. Petersburg says that Asiatic cholera now rages at Moscow in its worst form. People are suddenly attacked by the epidemic while walking in the streets, and there have been several cases in which death was instantaneous. According to the Official Messenger there were twenty-six cases of cholera at Orel on the 12th of January, and twenty-seven more were added in the following week. Of these fourteen are dead, and seventeen have recovered. In the Government of Minsk (Russian Poland) there were nine cases of cholera between the 29th of December and the 6th of January, six of which have ended fatally. At Kursk three persons were attacked on the 20th of January, all of whom have since died. The cholera has also appeared in the government of Smolensk, in Western Russia.

The Canton of Geneva continues to assert by its legislation the principle of separation between Church and State. We mentioned the resolution recently arrived at by the Grand Council to completely exclude religious instruction from the public schools. Another decision of the same assembly is now reported, which suppresses the great tithe to made to the Sisters of Charity. A fresh proposal will shortly be discussed to do away with the subvention given by the State to the Bishop, to enable him to meet the expenses of receiving priests. The Grand Council of Bâle, on its side, has just determined that, whilst maintaining Scriptural instruction in the public schools, it will not make that branch of study compulsory. This is quite a revolution for a Protestant canton, and up to the present time Protestant children were compelled, after nine years of age, to receive religious teaching. Those of the Roman Catholics and Jews were alone exempt from the obligation.

Mr. MILL writes to state that the letter of his which was read at the Greenwich meeting, at the Lambeth Baths in London did not express his views with regard to the memorial to the Queen, the letter having been written with reference to other matters. In reply to a request that he would sign the memorial, he wrote as follows: "As I perceive that part of a private letter to a friend, referring to matters that had been in discussion between us both verbally and by letter, has been printed as though it expressed my opinion on the memorial to the Queen with the meeting at the Lambeth Baths was held to present, (to which sentiments my letter does not pretend to allude whatever,) I should be obliged by your giving insertion to the letter I wrote in reply to the request to sign the memorial, of which letter I inclose a copy. The following is the letter referred to: "Dear Sir: It is not in my power to sign the memorial as it is drawn up; for, in the first place, I have not heard, and do not believe, that the Queen has been advised to give up the colonies." In the second place, the entire control of the waste lands of the colonies was, a quarter of a century ago, deliberately given up by the mother country to the Colonial Governments. I thought at the time, and still think, that this was a mistake; but any attempt now to revoke the concession could have no effect but to provoke the separation which the memorialists desire to avert. No measure, therefore, for making the colonial lands accessible to British emigrants, can now be taken by any authority save the Governments of the different colonies. The Queen cannot even propose such a measure to any Colonial Legislature, except through the medium of an Administration drawn from, and responsible to, the Colonial Legislature itself. Lastly, I think the proposed proclamation would be liable to great misinterpretation in the colonies, unless a wish for such a declaration were previously expressed by the colonies themselves; and though I agree with the memorialists in thinking that there should be systematic consultation on colonial affairs with representatives of the colonies, I think it should be with the elected authorities of those countries, and not with individuals selected by the Ministry at home, generally on very imperfect knowledge, to be made members of the Privy Council.

I am, &c., J. S. MILL.

Mr. C. W. EDDY.

ENGLAND.

The Irish Danger—Colonial Questions—Emigration—Views of the London Press on Emigration to the New World—Theatrical Gossip.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Saturday, Jan. 29, 1870.

The Pall Mall Gazette, which may have motives beyond my power of guessing, has published an alarming leading article on "The Irish Danger." It is not the Fenians nor the Repealers. They can be put down at once. It is the danger that the great body of the farmers, it disappointed by the Land bill which the Government is about to bring before Parliament, will con e in passive resistance to the landlords and refuse to pay their rent.

This may grow into the most serious and obstinate Irish difficulty which the English Government have had to meet. A time came (our rulers should realize the full gravity of the situation and act before it is too late."

When the farmers who have been expecting fixity of tenure

"are rudely awakened from their foolish dream by the announcement of the Government measure, it is on the cards that the whole seething and discordant, and now mutually hostile elements of Irish discontent may bury their differences and unite in a common disaffection; and Irishmen of all shades of political sentiment join to offer for once a combined resistance to defiance of Imperial authority. It is our fear, and almost our conviction, that no such difficulty or perplexing crisis has ever yet the Parliament has effective in its relations with the sister island—in the century at least. The Repeal agitation was not half so grave; the Fenian outbreak was not half so formidable; even the emancipation demand was incomparably less dangerous, because that could right-eously be disarmed by concession. But here it would be wicked and fatal to be well as weak to yield; the law must be enforced, the rights and property of citizens must be maintained, and their lives must be protected. Civil war must be courageously faced, if civil war be necessary."

Still the difficulty can be overcome

"if it be faced and firmly and peremptorily dealt with. Let the Government immediately before they bring forward their land scheme, arm themselves with ample power to suppress all violence, sedition and resistance, and make the law once again supreme."

So, if this is not sheer sensationalism, we are within ten days of an earthquake. The mine is charged, the train, as laid, the match is lighted, and Mr. GLADSTONE will touch it off before this letter can reach you. But if we are all blown to smithereens, you will hear of it by telegraph. But, really, did you ever see a leading article better calculated to make a panic on the Stock Exchange and a run on the Bank of England? But there is no run, and stocks have gone up.

COLONIAL QUESTIONS.

The Colonies do not seem to be lost sight of. The Red River rebellion came just in time for them. "A Colonist" has been writing to the Times in behalf of Canada. He fears, and not without reason, that England is afraid to keep Canada. But for Canada there could be no war between England and America. If there were no danger of such a war, there would be little need of army or navy, and it would be comparatively easy to deal with Ireland. With Canada independent, neutral, or annexed to the United States, neither England or America would even think of going to war with each other. They would not fight at such a distance. The question with timid politicians there is how best to get rid of Canada. She is independent now; but America will not recognize her independence and treat her as a neutral. To make her so, she must become independent in name as well as in fact; and that is not so easy. The "Colonist" who writes in the Times says Canada neither will nor can be thrown off; and therefore must become an integral portion of the Empire, under a central Government which shall bind together all its parts. And in case of a war with America, Canada, he thinks, could give good account of herself. She is impregnable in Winter and has 40,000 militia, the best raised as many men as the Confederate States ever had in the field, has stronger fortresses and more defensible positions, at long distances apart and across a more difficult country. Then she has the nucleus of a strong naval power and thousands of hardy seamen, with England behind her from which to draw supplies. If England gives up Canada she cannot hold Bermuda and must lose her West Indies. In short, Canada is the pivot of British power. If she is lost all is lost. England would not be able to send troops from India to Vancouver's Island, and so make a descent upon California. Australia would be unprotected and India untenable.

The Times is evidently impressed with this view of the case, but does not see its way to a Pan-Anglican confederation. The first condition of the formation of such a homogeneous Empire would be the formation of a central Government strong enough to control the whole, and every member of the confederation would be obliged to surrender something of its present independence and self-government, which not one of them will think of doing.

So, "The alternative is a system of self-governed communities owning a common origin, and bound to one another by ties of descent, of race, of language, and of literature, but enjoying complete political independence. England would remain the original of all, and the glory of occupying that relationship would be no mean one, if the communities spreading over the world, may well be deemed not inferior in the conception of an overruling supremacy."

So poor Canada must sit there like a rabbit, shivering under the cold eye of the boa constrictor that is waiting its convenience to crush, and swallow her up.

EMIGRATION.

Closely connected with the integrity of the Empire question, is that of emigration. England has parted with all control of the vast quantities of fertile land in her colonies. She cannot dispose of an acre in Canada, Australia, New-Zealand or South Africa. The Colonial Governments could, if they pleased, shut out colonists as they have shut out convicts; or they can put prohibitory duties on land as well as manufactures. England has no place for her surplus population which is under the control of the Imperial Parliament, which has shown its impotuousness by this foolish surrender of all control of the vast national territories. Still, the colonies want settlers. Men are the riches of all new countries, and are as much in demand in Australia as they are a drug in these islands. Vast numbers of Irish have been going there many years by their own energies and resources. Thousands of the Scotch have done the same, or been sent off by the proprietors who wanted their land for other uses. The English are now moving, as you have seen the past year. Large emigration societies are now being formed. The Government does not seem disposed to aid the work, though its members personally encourage it. Mr. GOSCHEN, President of the Poor Law Board, has declined to assist emigration officially, but he has subscribed liberally, offering to give as much a head for each thousand transported, and others are doing the same. The matter will be brought before Parliament, and an attempt made to induce the Government to allow at least the use of the transport ships for this purpose. If long screw steamers were used, taking the short sea route by the Suez Canal, it would shorten the voyage to Australia by one-half.

Where to go? Canada is near but cold. Australia is warm but distant. British Columbia too far to think of. New-Zealand has had too much trouble. Tasmania is recommended as a terrestrial Paradise, a garden of beauty and fertility, with a delicious climate and wonderful scenery. I know that JOHN MITCHELL has given a most fascinating description of it in his account of his residence there, but neither he nor General MEAGHER stayed there longer than they could help. A book has just been published which gives a strange account of this colony. It confirms all previous descriptions of the beauty and salubrity of the island, but says the inhabitants are deserting it. A horrible curse seems to rest upon it and drive people away. It has been the scene of the most awful crimes and fiendish battles, enacted by the convicts and settlers upon the natives and each other. The last native five has perished—the convicts are dying out, but the curse remains. A settled gloom is deep despondency comes over people—they can bear it no longer, and depart—so that unless settlers can soon be induced to come from England the whole country will become a desert.

Tasmania, formerly known as Van Diemen's Land, south of Australia, is about as large as Ireland, or one of the larger American States, that is, it is 200 miles by 310, and contains about 25,000 square miles, with a population of some 90,000. It is full of mountains, rivers, lakes, climate and productions like those of Pennsylvania or Virginia. A beautiful country, but a long way to go. And when the English emigrant has looked the world all over, he is apt to make up his mind that the best country for him to go to is the one he can most readily reach, and in which he will find most of the elements of civilization. America, on the whole, offers him more inducements than any British Colony, and Americans will continue to get the greater number of those who wish to better themselves by leaving these islands. Assisted emigrants will go to the colonies that assist them. Those who can help themselves or who are left to their free choice, will go to America. Even those who go first to Canada will find their way across into the States. The Standard gives a glowing account of the inducements to emigrate to the Red River country, where "millions of acres, as level as a lawn, await the plow, without a tree upon the surface or a rock beneath the soil. The fallow earth, unsilled from the hour of man's creation, waits to give forth its fruit, prepared to nourish myriads of people." Very nice, but did the writer ever look upon the map and calculate how emigrants, men, women and children, are to get there?

No doubt it is the interest of England that great masses of the English speaking nations of the future should be loyal, or at least friendly to their mother land; and this the "Colonist" argues can be secured by emigrants from either Great Britain or Ireland going anywhere except to the United States.

"Take," he says, "the Irish exodus to the United States and to Canada. In the former, the emigrant finds himself surrounded by influences hostile to England, his old antipathies are not only reproduced, but intensified, and, without almost any exception, every Irishman there becomes a Fenian, the power of whose incensing with the wrongs of his native land, he finds Mr. BRIGHT, in the House of Commons, ready to aid him in the Senate, he finds Mr. SUMNER, in the Senate, ready to aid him in the House. In Canada, in the Church, we have grievances, he brandishes them his fair share of influence in the direction of public affairs; his surroundings and the example of his countrymen all tend to make him a loyal subject, and there is not one in a thousand who would take most to readily entitle a Fenian invasion of the Canadian frontier. Are, then, the symbol of Saxon and Celtic, the amalgamation of English speaking race, and that which relegation of a feeling of revenge, without which a community must deteriorate, of no account in these outlying portions of the Empire, even as respects the future of Great Britain? I hesitate alluding to the passionate sentiment of loyalty to the person and family of the New origin, no less than to the Constitution, existing in the hearts of the great body of colonists. No one last Autumn, who did not witness the almost idolatrous devotion accorded to Prince ARTHUR in his recent visit to the rural districts of Canada, simply because he was the son of their Sovereign. It was not mere curiosity, it was a conscious ambition to be, perhaps, an garter ducks for dirty money, but a genuine and respectful homage, coming from the heart of a loyal people."

THE TIMES, which does not welcome its way to a great Pan-Anglican Confederation, petting the colonies, and comprising, as Mr. FOURNIER says, all English-speaking peoples, thinks that though all may become independent in America, they may still continue in the bond of peace, and all the better, perhaps, without being overruled by a central authority, while England would be regarded by all as their "ancient home, rich in inherited experience of political life, the home of the imagination of all that is sublime in their common literature, the repository of accumulated treasures of arts and science. Nor would the work of England cease. Whatever the Colonies may become, their Constitutions have been modelled on the lessons of England. It should be the ambition of the inhabitants of those isles, remembering how much will have been especially reserved for them, to continue to work out the social and political questions in the solution of which it is to be found the means of elevating the politics of the world."

These are beautiful sentiments, and I trust that I appreciate them fully. I think, indeed, that all the nations of the world ought to go down on their knees and humbly learn political science of England, this great country which, after three centuries, is beginning to pacify Ireland; which has managed to build such a metropolis as London at the expression of its sense of the beautiful in architecture, and art, and taste, as the centre of its national life; which is now struggling with its dense masses of pauperism and crime; which is trying to fling off its surplus and poverty-stricken population; which cannot control the outrages of great masses of its artisans, now engaged about Sheffield in unionist and non-unionist fights; which is agitating for the education of its millions of children growing up in ignorance; and doing it all with that serene and sublime self-complacency which finds its expression in the leaders of the Times and Daily Telegraph.

THEATRICALS.

Mr. TOM TAYLOR'S German drama of "Queen Elizabeth" is a fiasco, and the Times critic hopes it may have opened a new era for the English stage. It seems likely, if it be true, that when things get to their worst they mend. With rare exceptions it is a hearty task to go to a London theatre—the rule of acting bored and disgusted by poor pieces and bad acting. I try them all round from time to time, not in much hope, but from a sense of duty, and three times in four I come home thinking I will never go to that house again. The acting in the first place teases your nerves to pieces; you are glad it is a stupid piece, for the acting would spoil a good one. Then you get the principal piece and the star performers, and it may be worse yet. It is useless to damn a piece the first night. The manager has spent his money on it, and has no other. As to the burlesques, pretty legs, dash songs, and cellar flap dances tire you at last. Oh, that London could have one theatre like the Français at Paris, or the Odeon, where you could be sure of good plays and good acting. There ought to be wealth enough and taste enough in England to establish and support one national theatre, which should be a model and normal school for all the rest; to appear at which should be the ambition of every artist; where an engagement would be for the actor what an honorary degree of Oxford or Cambridge is to a man of science and letters. The universities grant a degree of "Mus. Doc." to musicians—why not a corresponding degree to actors? But the engagement to play at such a theatre as I imagine would be degree enough in every line of acting—a passport to all English-speaking theatres in the world. Literature may not need an academy, but art, and especially the dramatic art, needs every means of culture, and everything which can improve the standard of requirement. The drama prospers, for people will have amusement—but its prosperity is chaotic, disorderly and of a very uncertain character. The sensation of the hour, perhaps of the season, is the appearance of M. HERVE in "Chilpéric," a burlesque opera of the liveliest character. M. HERVE is a genius full of originality, and with as much go, almost, as OFFENBACH. He composes, sings, dances, and acts the most grotesque parts with equal vigor; and his broken English brightens the fun of his performance. MONADNOCK.

THE ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

Dogmatic Formulas Submitted to the Assembly.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

It will be remembered that among the propositions submitted to the Council by the preliminary commissions was a series of dogmatic formulas. The first twenty-one of these are issued, and have now reached us. The Civiltà Cattolica, the special organ of the Pope, has lately published a series of articles which are now considered as having been obviously intended to prepare the Catholic world for the appearance of these canons, of which the following is a translation:

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

Canon I.—Whosoever says that the religion of Christ is not existing and expressed in any community established by Christ Himself, but that it can be rightly held and exercised by each individual for himself, and without regard to any community which constitutes the Church of Christ, let him be anathema.

Canon II.—Whosoever says the Church has not received from Christ any positive and unchangeable organization, but that it is, just like any other human community, mutable and transformable according to the changes of the times, let him be anathema.

Canon III.—Whosoever says the Church of Divine Foundation is not an external and visible community, but a purely internal and invisible one, let him be anathema.

Canon IV.—Whosoever says that the true Church is not a body in itself, but consists of dispersed and disjointed communions, and is diffused throughout them all; or that the elements constituting organic unity in these communions are opposed to each other in their production of faith, and divided in their spirit, equally suffice to constitute the true and perfect Church of Christ, let him be anathema.

Canon V.—Whosoever says that the Church of Christ is not an institution absolutely necessary for reaching eternal happiness, or that men can arrive at this blessing through the exercise of any other kind of religion, let him be anathema.

Canon VI.—Whosoever says that the authority with which the Catholic Church prescribes and condemns all religious acts separated from its communion is not prescribed by Divine right; or that about religious truths only opinions, not certainties, can exist, and that therefore all religious acts are to be tolerated, let him be anathema.

Canon VII.—Whosoever says that this very Church of Christ can fall into darkness or error, and so deviate from the Holy Truth in faith and morals, and fall away from its original institution into degeneracy and corruption, let him be anathema.

Canon VIII.—Whosoever says that the present Church of Christ is not the last and highest institution for reaching eternal happiness, but that there is another to be expected through a new and more complete effusion of the Holy Spirit, let him be anathema.

Canon IX.—Whosoever says that the infall

CURRENT LITERATURE.

HUSH!

Hush! the murmur of the river,
And the breeze through oak and pine
Flutters to the open casement:
Thrills the slender Eglantine:
Lo! one comes; I hear the rustle
Of her garments through the gloom,
And her footstep wakes the echo,
And her presence fills the room.

Hush! I hear a trembling promise
And a fond farewell of tears,
And my vision lies behind me
In the valley of the years.
There a moment met together
Neither speak, and neither move,
With a sudden sense of sorrow
Born of memory and of Love.

Hush! the night is still and tiny
Love must whisper full of truth;
Let the glory of her presence
Brighten half my youthful youth.
Link our hands, my heart relenting
Oh! believed I forgive!
Know such moments come from Heaven
When the dead return and live.

THE FLOWER OF THE RUINS.

FROM THE SPANISH OF FERNAN CABALLERO.

BY S. G. FABIE.

At the beginning of this century, and before the French invasion of the Spanish peninsula, a large party was assembled in one of the country houses which surround Lisbon like so many nests of flowers.

At that time, political subjects were confined to the ministers of the Government. Would that the same would come to pass now! Then we should be able to speak of them with the same tranquillity to which a husband gave utterance on gazing at the form of his wife:

"Si gli era bella, Ah! ei ne fu pel bieco
Ma non sen rapea di poco in meno!"

From this it caused that those who met together in society did not hold arguments, but only amused themselves. Men did not seek to give themselves the importance and appearance of public characters, those affected the air of wisdom often enough counterfeited to private life, nor did they look forward to a sour and critical old age. On the contrary, they preferred, sometimes even to excess, a cheerful and energetic youth, which at all events did not make men hypocritical, arrogant or less fitted to govern.

The women, without having any pretensions to the spirit of independence with which advanced ideas sought to inoculate them, did not aspire to be free, but they were in reality sovereigns—a thing which the good taste and delicacy of that state of society produced. The influence of woman is the most refined culture which man receives.

The lady of the house in which the company we have mentioned was assembled, was seated at the table, which was covered with a sumptuous repast. Considering that she had passed her première jeunesse, she was still very pretty; and though, with her accustomed good taste, she devoted herself unceasingly to the guests at her side, her black and beautiful eyes did not stir from an elegant and handsome young man who was seated at the further end of the table. One of those who were sitting near her, and who was an intimate friend of the house, noticed it and smiled. Then she said to him in a low and trembling voice:

"Is he not certainly very handsome?"

"As certainly as that he is the image of yourself," answered her friend.

"No, no," replied the lady: "I am petite, and he has the figure of his father."

"It is true," answered her neighbor, "that he has the tall stature of his father, but that does not prevent his having the perfect features of his mother."

This son had just returned from England, where his father, who was a Consul, had determined that he should be educated; and it was in honor of his return that the present entertainment was given.

The company had risen from the table, and now formed into different groups, some remaining at the table, some at the card-tables, and others on the terrace in front of the house, to enjoy the fresh air and beautiful view which extended into the distance, most lovely though, in the magic light of the moon, which, reflected in the sea, gave it a brilliant horizon of silver.

The lady of the house sat down by the door opening into the garden, and in a short time the new-comer came and seated himself by her.

"How beautiful this is, mother!" exclaimed he, with enthusiasm.

"To which she replied:

"You have not, then, altogether forgotten your country in the ten years you have been away, my son?"

"Oh, no!" answered the young man. "But the images my memory preserved were those which my childhood saw with childhood's eyes, and which are consequently completely distinct from those I now perceive."

"And which please you most?"

"That will be difficult for me to tell, mother. But that which I can unhesitatingly prefer to you is, that which I now see has the advantage of my surprise and inspiring admiration without having lost the indefinable charm which memory lends it. Thus it is that both my eyes and heart enjoy it at the same moment."

II.

Pedro, for so was the new-comer named, had a nature essentially and profoundly poetic. Not that he had a vast and creative imagination, but he possessed in his heart an ever-flowing fount of poetry. Therefore, if he did not express a beautiful thought in verse well, he yet appreciated everything with this poetic manna sent down from Heaven on our barren life; and besides this, he lent to matters a romantic hue or disposition, since for this poetry consisted in the simple and or gay, but not in the extravagant. His ideal was a restricted one, and illumined with its own divine internal light every thing which was naturally good, innocent and sincere. He instinctively kept aloof from the turbid volcanoes and lavas of the imagination—from deceitful lights and false though brilliant ideas, from the common sound of pembastic weariness, having, like the Kings of the East, a star in the sky which he followed with blind faith.

Thus it was that Pedro was a modest and retiring young man, because in his mother he had found that similarity of ideas and sentiments which Empires and engender entire centuries. Divorced by inclination and by duty from all vice, he had not sought, but with young men of his own stamp, he went to display them; we know not whether as praiseworthy, or as signs of want of prejudice, or as ornaments, or as trophies of rebellion.

It happened that he was constrained to walk alone without falling on this occasion to enjoy himself among those myrtles and laurels which make that of Lisbon one of the most beautiful parks of all Europe.

Pedro had often passed with mother, of humble condition, but remarkable beauty, who used to sit all alone some of the benches in the promenade, and who bowed her head on her hand, and only raised her eyes from the ground to fix them upon him. There was in these glances a mixture of sorrow, of innocence, or ignorance of the usages of society, united to an infernal art capable, yet impelled for by him who inspired it, that could not fail to surprise him. Nevertheless, in the delicate feelings of Pedro, the irritation caused by this overcome all the attraction that her beauty and all the interest with which her sorrow ought naturally to have inspired him. Every evening he found the girl in the same place; every evening he saw some young gallants, whom this beauty apparition attracted, rudely repulsed; and every evening the scene that was gradually being deeply engraved on that young and beautiful face was more marked.

Kérasty says that God has given pity to the wicked for disgrace. Then it happened that after some days, Pedro, on entering the promenade at evening, and noticing that the girl rose up to go away (and, by way of farewell, fixed on him her large eyes, from which flowed floods of tears,) in spite of the natural timidity of his character and severity of his conduct, was indeed to follow her; more by reason of the compassion her tears excited than by the power her beauty exercised.

When in his pursuit he had penetrated some solitary paths, Pedro hastened up to her and asked, timidly, if any grief afflicted her, and if it was of a nature which he could remedy or alleviate.

"I am deeply disgraced," answered she, bursting into a bitter flood of tears.

"What disgrace has befallen you?"

"I cannot tell it."

"Then you will not find advice. Why do you come every evening to the promenade?"

"Formerly I came because they obliged me; now I come of my own free will."

"Who was it, and what was the motive that compelled you, who are so young and beautiful, to come all alone to a public walk?"

"That I cannot tell you."

"And why do you now come of yourself?"

"The girl was silent. Pedro repeated his question.

"What matters it to you?" she answered, with a mixture of indignation, grief and tenderness, which, though closely united, made themselves each clearly perceptible in her hasty words, her bitter accent, and her tears of sorrow.

"It matters to me because I ask you," said Pedro.

"But why does it matter to you?"

"Because you interest me."

"Really?" exclaimed she.

"Most truly," answered Pedro. "Tell me the motive for your grief."

"It cannot be. If I interest you, show me that it is so in some other way than by asking questions."

Pedro took from his purse a piece of gold and offered it to her.

"Not this!" she exclaimed, with energy. "Prove your interest neither by caressing nor by money. The one shows curiosity the other charity, but neither shows——"

She paused, and added, with sorrow, "interest."

"Let me accompany you to your home!" said Pedro, every moment more charmed, and every moment more interested by this strange girl. She could not conceal a shudder, and cried:

"No, no! do not think of it. It cannot be."

"Are you married?" asked Pedro.

"I am not married, and I never will marry—never!"

"Then in what can I serve you?" returned he, astonished at encountering such anomalies, such strange reluctance in this angular being.

"Serve me? In nothing can you serve me," answered she.

"But in what, at least, can I please you and show you my interest?"

"By letting me admire you, speak to you, and love you, without repulsing me as hitherto you have done."

The temperate character of Pedro, the delicacy of his ideas and feelings regarding the reserve and modesty of women (qualities so instinctive in them that no education is needed for implanting them in their minds) received a rude shock at hearing these words.

Seeing that he kept silence, the girl began to burst into a bitter flood of tears, exclaiming:

"Mother, mother! why didst thou bear me? How cruel all men are!"

"But and if I in my turn should love you, as certainly might happen?" asked Pedro.

"And what harm would there be in it?" replied she.

"Because," said Pedro, "I cannot and ought not to love without knowing whom I love, without knowing that mysterious being who hides herself from me; a woman who, like a cloud, appears without one's knowing whence she comes, and who, like a cloud, can disappear without one's knowing whither she will go."

"I thought," answered she, "that have asked no further question and required to know nothing more than that it was reciprocated; but I see that even to be loved one needs a passport. Farewell! Forget an unhappy being who thought for a moment to find a heart that would give the one which was so lonely a little love in exchange for all its own."

So saying, she left him. Pedro hastened after her. Then the girl stopped, and said, clasping her hands,

"For Heaven's sake! for heaven's sake! do not follow me. I swear to you that to-morrow you shall find me in the promenade."

And swift as those fiery vapors which are seen but for a moment without giving one time to seize on them, she vanished like them into the darkness.

III.

On the following day Pedro, without previous intention and even without noticing it, went out rather earlier than on other evenings to go to his usual walk. But, notwithstanding this, when he reached it there was the strange girl in her same attitude and in her accustomed place.

In a short time she rose and left the promenade. Pedro followed her at a distance, until having penetrated some solitary paths where the light of day was dimmed by the almost total absence of the sun, he could overtake and speak to her without being noticed.

"Whatever was said on either side was, with but slight variation the same they had spoken the evening before; the interview ending on her part with the vehement and strict prohibition against his following her, and a promise to return the next evening. Every evening Pedro came more deeply in love, more interested and more attracted by the beautiful girl who was at once so delicate and so untaught, so feeling and so stern, so frank and so mysterious; and who finally possessed this last peculiarity of not being able to give Pedro the least information about herself, her family, and her condition.

Although the new-born confidence which was thus established between two persons, who both experienced, as by agreement, the same feelings, authorized Pedro to be exacting in his questions, and compelled her to be frank in her answers, he nevertheless learned nothing; for the tender and happy girl, who smiled with such sweetness, turned away in silence and sternness on hearing his questions, and if he persisted in them she threatened to depart forever from his side. On the point which Pedro most insisted upon—namely, the knowing where she lived—he could extract no other answer than the single and constant repetition that she lived amongst the ruins, this declaration serving at the same time both as an answer to the inquiries of her lover, and as an excuse for not introducing him into her house. Thus it was that Pedro, in default of another name, had given her that of the "Flower of the Ruins," since, so long as love and poetry exist, a flower will always be the emblem of a beautiful or beloved girl.

The love and poetic mind of Pedro sometimes induced him to think that she whom he loved might be some orphan immured since childhood in some convent or educational establishment, who had found means of freeing herself, and escaping for a few hours from her confinement. At other times he conjectured that she might be a member of some ruined family, who were living in isolation and obscurity in a corner of their ancient family mansion. And, lastly, at other times he trembled at the idea that she might be unhappily married, and fled in secret from her husband's yoke.

In this manner passed the Spring, which, together with other flowers, had sheltered this love, and then, when it spring up in the free air between Heaven and earth, in the midst of flowers, like the love of the birds and butterflies, singing like the one, playing like the other, and, like both, without asking thought for the morrow. But Spring passed, and its brother Summer, Autumn following with shortening days and clouded skies, and the interviews of the lovers became less long and less frequent. Then, it was that Pedro determined to free himself from the strange and forced conditions in which he found himself placed.

He had, however, gained one great advantage in his battle to impose this yoke upon him, even during the short reign of the girl—that is, in the time she had been beloved; and this advantage was that which the one of two lovers possesses who is more fatuous than that which he himself feels. Then it was that, trusting to the ascendency he exercised over his beloved, he intimated to her the final resolution he had adopted of making her choose between the alternative of putting an end to relations enveloped in a mystery, which kept their souls asunder, and which could not in this manner satisfy either the heart or his reason, or of introducing him frankly and openly into her house and private life.

"But why," said the lovingly, though grieved, "do you wish to know the ruins? Does not the flower satisfy you?"

"The flower does satisfy me," replied Pedro; but I wish for it with its roots, I wish to take it from its native and beautiful soil, a soil which may be mine, and in which I can cultivate it without fear of its being torn from me by violence."

"The flower of the ruins has thorns, and knows how to protect itself," answered she; "and it cannot," she added, sadly, "be transplanted. Besides, the ruins will cause the flower to be despoiled."

"This stranger and profoundest secrecy will do so even more," said Pedro.

The poor girl, in her grief, earnest entreaty, wept, but it was all in vain. Pedro exasperated by her obstinacy herself, resisted, [illegible] and the pain [illegible] with burning into a bitter flood of tears. [illegible] enough with [illegible] for gratifying the whims of her lover.

IV.

At that time there was in the upper part of Lisbon a suburb which had been destroyed by the earthquake of 1755, and not rebuilt. It was composed of broad streets of ruins, destitute of beauty and picturesqueness, old and tottering to their fall, without associations either grave or dear, and recollections—fragments without a history, and without the solemn value of death, such as those ruins possess which are made by time—destruction having set her ravenous seal upon them as on those which are caused by man, or produced by a deluge.

The walls of the houses were, however, still standing, but some being despoiled of their window frames and lattices, seemed like eyes without eyelids, and others, deprived of their doors, like the entrances to caverns. The courtyards and houses, full of pools of water and rubbish, displayed as their only dress some gnarling nettle or silent lizard, which latter, in color like the stones, was scarce perceptible amongst them. A feeble echo from some sighing passage answered the melancholy reflections which inspired him who trod amid this assemblage of things that once had been. Nothing was left of that which life had given them. Together with their inhabitants and occupants the ornaments and comforts with which, every one of lowly condition adorns his dwelling, as the birds their nests with feathers and with moss. Nothing could be seen more uncongenial to sight and feeling than these lines of bare and desolate ground, which appeared to be the residence of absolute mystery, the dwelling of unpunished crime, and the refuge of solitary desolation.

It is true that at the foot of the height on which they were, there was the splendid promenade, in which, amidst myrtles and laurels, walked a brilliant throng. It is true that some distance off, and on the banks of the Tagus, life and commerce streamed swiftly past the gorgeous squares. But they were separated from the ruins by gloomy streets, the former contrasts by glare which hedges thither, neither, by that which annihilates and destroys more than death, forgetfulness.

Nevertheless, where is to be found a place in which life will not be met with, since even in the coffin wherein a corpse is inclosed and buried in the earth, life springs up again?

Thus it was that in these forsaken and gloomy skeletons of what had once been houses, there had installed himself one or other of those voluntary pariahs who live in isolation, because this isolation is to which prices sympathizes with, or suits them.

A thatch of reeds, a piece of matting hung up before the apertures which had once been windows, some rotten boards joined together at either end by wooden cross-pieces, and fastened inside with a bar so as to form a door, were the means made to render part of the ruins habitable. In what once had been the interior of the house, and in the yards and courts, some sighs were to be seen, lying themselves as tortoiseshell, or Sybarites on beds of filth that were never cleared away, or a lean cook mounted on the loftiest heap of rubbish, and crowing, with all the pride that this gallant warrior could expend in order that he might gain the doubtful reputation of having roused them.

How great, then, was Pedro's horror when, preceded by his guide, he reached this desolate spot, which was that to which she conducted him; and when, pushing open one of the doors described above, she led him into one of these wretched and gloomy caverns!

"Whither are you taking me?" asked Pedro, with horror, pausing at the entrance.

"Did I not tell you?" answered she, dejectedly. "Did I not tell you that the ruins would rob the flower of its illusion?"

"But," exclaimed Pedro, "why did you not confide to me the wretched way you live? Why, with inconceivable and strange pride, did you refuse the assistance of the man who loved you?"

"I could not accept it; and, in consequence of this, I cannot alter my mode of life in the least degree."

"Why?"

"Because I am a slave."

"A slave! Of whom?"

"Of my wicked brothers. I have endeavored to set myself free and fly from their cruel tyranny, and these attempts have always proved vain and cost me dear. Look at this scar on my neck, this arm that I can scarcely move because of a dislocation I have suffered, and you will perceive not only the yoke which weighs heavy on me but also the danger my life would be in were I to escape from them, since, in whatever place I hid myself, their dagger would find me out."

"And what do they compel you to do, unhappy one?"

"To take care of their house and prepare their food. They compel me, gracious Heaven! to attract hither those rich men who recklessly persist in following me wherever they make me go and show myself in public places."

"What say you?" cried Pedro, in terror.

"Yes, yes!" exclaimed she, with vehement despair; "yes, yes! It is for this they avail themselves of the beauty they say Heaven has given me. And when once they have entered these ruins, which, like accomplices, hide and conceal the dead, they dispose of them; and, in order that this crime may not be known or come to light——"

Her voice died away in her throat as she spoke, and she looked round in her turn with terror, as though she feared to see among the cracks of the tottering and ruined walls, ears that might be hearing, and eyes that might be watching her.

"Go on," said Pedro, in anxious suspense; "what do they?"

The girl drew near her lover, and said to him, in a low and feeble voice,

"They murder them!"

"Horror!" cried Pedro, turning from her. "And have I loved this murderess, this decoy of criminals, this siren of the tomb?"

"It is for this reason," continued she, "that I have never wished to bring you to my home. It is for this reason I have resisted your request with such obstinacy. And when compelled by you, I have gratified your wish, availing myself of the absence of my brothers, and when, in obedience to you, I have sought to prove to you my own love, woe is me! I have only lost yours!"

Sighs, tears and fast sealed Pedro's lips.

"And, nevertheless," continued she, "you are the only man, the only being I have ever loved! Through the love I bore for you, which rendered it impossible for me to betray more victims, I have received the wound whose scar I still preserve. And what have I craved of you in exchange for this poor 'flower of the ruins,' but that which the humblest flower craves of the sun, leave to grow up in the heat and brilliance of his light! What do you dread in her whom you have loved a little, that you shrink from her? Oh! unhappy women, always thrust on by men to evil, and never supported by them when they wish to do good! Miserable wretches deprived of mercy, of which their hearts have never ceased to thirst! Fragile beings, cast down from a high eminence of possession, whom he dishonors with his love, and destroys by his cruelty, desertion, or contempt!

All that the girl said was so true, so applicable to herself, that Pedro at last, in pity was going to pacify her when, that heard furious blows dealt upon the door.

V.

"Gracious Heaven! It is they!" cried the girl, terrified at hearing the blows.

"Who?" asks Pedro.

"My brothers—the murderers without pity, your executioners without mercy," answered the visiting hands in fear.

The blows redoubled.

"What is to be done, Mother of mercy! What is to be done?" murmured the wretched girl, dancing round in her turn with troubled looks, as though to find a means of safety which it was not possible to find.

The badly-fastened door yielded at this instant to a vigorous push, and three villainous-looking fellows entered the dwelling, which was dimly lighted by a candle stuck on one of the projections of the bare wall. After having addressed as their sister some few brutal words of chase for her slowness in admitting them, they turned their attention to Pedro, without showing any signs of surprise at finding him there. But the sister, throwing herself in their way, shielded her lover with her own body, exclaiming vehemently:

"No, you shall not kill him without first piercing my breast!"

As his only answer, the eldest of the three seized her by the arm and hurled her to the ground, at some distance, thus hurling her away from the spot where this scene was passing.

Pedro was unarmed; but even if he had possessed any weapon, resistance to three such ruffians would have been as useless as it would have been foolish, and would only have served to hasten the inevitable fate [illegible] the ruffians [illegible] the [illegible] the [illegible] the

The agent of Count Jerry and lawyers were upon him, and he saw no way to extricate himself from the difficulty. But something had to be done, and so, with a sensitive frown, he drawled out the words: "Well, Squire ——, I don't know as I care much about this case, any way."—Pelton's Monthly.

THE CHILD THAT WENT WITH THE FAIRIES.

Eastward of the old city of Limerick about ten Irish miles, under the range of mountains known as the Slieveelim hills, famous as having afforded Sarsfield a shelter among their rocks and hollows, when he crossed them in his gallant descent upon the cannon and ammunition of King William, as he was to the beleaguering army, there runs a very old and narrow road. It connects the Limerick road to Tipperary with the old road from Limerick to Dublin, and runs by bog and pasture, hill and hollow, straw-thatched village, and roofless castle, not far from twenty miles.

Skirting the heathy mountains of which I have spoken, at one part it becomes singularly lonely. For more than three Irish miles it traverses a deserted country. A wide, black bog, level as a lake, skirted with sapsé, spreads at the left as you journey northward, and the long and irregular line of mountain rises at the right, clothed to touch, broken with lines of gray rock that resemble the bold and irregular outlines of fortifications, and riven with many a gully, expanding here and there into rocky and wooded glens, which open as they approach the road.

A sandy pasturage, on which browsed a few scattered sheep or kine, skirts this solitary road for some miles, and under shelter of a hillock, and of two or three great ash-trees, stood, not many years ago, the little thatched cabin of a widow named Mary Ryan.

Poor was this widow in a land of poverty. The thatch had acquired the gray tint and sunken outlines that show how the alternations of rain and sun have told upon that perishable shelter.

But whatever other dangers threatened, there was one well provided against by the care of other times. Round the cabin stood half a dozen mountain ashes, as the rowans, inimical to witches, are there called. On the worn planks of the door were nailed two horseshoes, and over the lintel and spreading along the thatch, grew, luxuriant, patches of that ancient cure for many maladies, and prophylactic against the machinations of the evil one, the house-leek. Descending into the doorway, in the clear centre of the interior, when your eye grew sufficiently accustomed to that dim light, you might discover, hanging at the head of the widow's wooden-roofed bed, her beads and a phial of holy water.

Here certainly were defences and bulwarks against the intrusion of that unearthly and evil power, of whose vicinity this solitary family were constantly reminded by the outline of Lisnavoura, that lonely hill haunt of the "Good people," as the fairies are called euphemistically, whose strangely dome-like summit rose not half a mile away, looking like an outwork of the long line of mountain that sweeps by it.

It was at the fall of the leaf, and an autumnal sunset threw the lengthening shadow of haunted Lisnavoura, close in front of the solitary little cabin, over the undulating slopes And sides of Slieveelim. The birds were singing among the branches in the thinning leaves of the melancholy ash trees that grew at the roadside in front of the door. The widow's three younger children were playing on the road, and their voices mingled with the evening song of the birds. Their elder sister Nell was "within in the house," as their phrase is, seeing after the boiling of the potatoes for supper.

Their mother had gone down to the bog to carry up a hamper of turf on her back. It is a laborious, a miserable custom, and if not disused, long may it continue—for the wealthier people when cutting their turf and stacking it in the bog, to make a smaller stack for the behoof of the poor, who were welcome to take from it so long as it lasted, and thus the potato pot was kept boiling, and the hearth warm that would have been cold enough but for that good-natured bounty, through wintry months.

Moll Ryan trudged up the steep "boherreen," whose banks were overgrown with thorn and brambles, and stooping under her burden, reentered her door, where her dark-haired daughter Nell met her with a welcome and relieved her of the hamper.

Moll Ryan looked round with a sight of relief, and drying her forehead, uttered the Munster ejaculation:

"Fish, whisht! It's tired I am with it, God bless it. And where's the crawthurs, Nell?"

"Playin' out on the road, mother; didn't ye see them and you comin' up?"

"No; there was no one before me on the road," she said, mentally; "not a soul, Nell; and why didn't ye keep an eye on them?"

"Well, they're in the haggard, playin' there, or round by the back of the house. Will I call them in?"

"Do, asy good girl, in the name o' God. The hens is comin' home, see, and the sun was just down over Knockdoulah, an' I comin' up."

So out ran tall, dark-haired Nell, and standing on the road looked up and down it; but not a sign of her two little brothers, Con and Bill, or her little sister Peg, could she see. She called them; but no answer came from the little haggard, fenced with straggling bushes. She listened, but the sound of their voices was missing. Over the stile, and behind the house she ran—but there all was silent and deserted.

She looked down toward the bog, as far as she could see; but they did not appear. Again she listened—but in vain. At first she had felt angry, but now a different feeling overcame her, and she grew pale. With an undefined boding she looked toward the heathy bog of Lisnavoura, now darkening into the deepest purple against the flaming sky of sunset.

Again she listened with a sinking heart, and heard nothing but the farewell twitter and whistle of the birds in the bushes around. How many stories had she listened to by the winter hearth, of children stolen by the fairies, at nightfall, in lonely places! With this fear she knew her mother was haunted.

No one in the country round gathered her little flock about her so early as this frightened widow, and no door in the seven parishes was barred so early.

Unfamiliar as fearful as all young people in those parts of the wild arts of such dreaded and subtle agents, Nell was none more than usually afraid of them for her terrors were infected and redoubled by her mother's. She was looking towards Lisnavoura in a trance of fear, and crossed herself again and again, and whispered a prayer after prayer. She was interrupted by her mother's voice in the road calling her loudly. She answered, and ran round to the front of the cabin, where she found her standing.

"And where is the world's the crawthurs, did ye meet them, mot's alarmed than ever.

"Where is Billy—where is he?" cried the mother, nearly breathless, as soon as she was within hearing distance of another.

"He's gone—they took him away; but they said he'd come back again," answered little Con, with the dark brown hair.

"He's gone away with the grand ladies," blubbered the little girl.

"What ladies? Where? Oh, Lord, mothers! Did ladies see you? Where was he? Where is he? Who took him? What ladies are you talkin' about? What way did he go? Speak out, can ye?" she continued, in a fever of excitement.

"I couldn't see where he went, mother; 'twas like as if he was going to Lismoyura."

With a wild exclamation the distracted woman ran on towards the hill alone, clasping her hands, and crying aloud the name of her lost child.

Scared and horrified, Nell, not daring to follow, gazed after her, and burst into tears; and the other children raised high their lamentations a shrilly wailing.

Twilight was deepening. It was long past the time when they were usually housed securely within their habitation. Nell had the younger children into the cabin, and made them sit down by the turf fire, while she stood in the open door, watching in great fear for the return of her mother.

After a long while they did see their mother return. She came in and sat down by the fire, and cried as if her heart would break.

"Will I bar the door, mother?" asked Nell.

"Ay, do—didn't I lose enough, this night, without leavin' the door open, for more of you to go; but first take an' sprinkle us dark a' the holy water over ye, herishin, and bring it here till I throw a taste iv it over myself and the craythurs an' I weather, Nell, you'd forget to do the like yourself, letting the craythurs out so near nightfall. Come here and sit on my knee, asthore, come to me, mavourneen, and hould me fast in the name o' God, and I'll hould you fast that none can take ye from me, and tell me all about it, and what it was—the Lord be preserve us and barr—an' how it happened, and who was in it?"

And the door being barred, the two children, sometimes speaking together, often interrupting one another, often interrupted by their mother, managed to tell this strange story, which I had better relate connectedly and in my own language.

The Widow Ryan's three children were playing, as I have said, upon the narrow old road in front of the door. Little Bill or Leum, about five years old, with golden hair and large blue eyes, was a very pretty boy, with all the clear tints of healthy childhood, and that gaze of earnest simplicity which belongs not to town children of the same age. His little sister Peg, about a year elder, and his brother Con, a little more than a year older than she, made up the little group.

Under the great old ash-trees, whose last leaves were falling at their feet, in the light of an October sunset, they were playing with the hilarity and eagerness of rustic children, clamoring together, and their faces were turned towards the west and the storied hill of Lisnavoura.

Suddenly a startling voice with a screech called to them from behind, ordering them to get out of the way, and turning, they saw a sight such as they never beheld before. It was a carriage drawn by four horses, that for its part was gaudy and startling, in impatience, as if just pulled up. The children were almost under their feet, and scrambled to the side of the road next their own door.

This carriage and all its appointments were old-fashioned and gorgeous, and presented to the children, who had never seen anything finer than a turf-cart, and once, an old chaise that passed that way from Killaloe, a spectacle perfectly dazzling.

Here was antique splendor. The harness and trappings were scarlet, and blazing with gold. The horses were huge, and snow white, with great manes, that as they tossed and shook them in the air, seemed to stream and float sometimes longer and sometimes shorter, like so much smoke—their tails were long, and tied up in bows of broad scarlet and gold ribbon. The coach itself was glowing with colors, gilded and emblazoned. There were footmen behind in gay liveries and three-cocked hats, like the coachman's; but he had a great wig, like a judge's, and their hair was frizzed out and powdered, and a long thick "pigtail," with a bow to it, hung down the back of each.

All these servants were diminutive, and ludicrously out of proportion with the enormous horses of the equipage, and had sharp, sallow features, and small restless, fiery eyes, and faces of cunning and malice that scared the children. The little coachman was scowling, and showing his white fangs under his cocked hat, and his little blazing beads of eyes were quivering with fury in their sockets as he whirled his whip round and round over their heads, till the lash of it looked like a streak of fire in the evening sun, and sounded like the cry of a legion of "sillapoueeks" in the air.

"Stop the Princess on the highway!" cried the coachman, in a piercing treble.

"Stop the Princess on the highway!" piped each footman in turn, scowling over his shoulder down on the children, and grinding his keen teeth.

The children were so frightened they could only gape and turn white in their panic. But a very sweet voice from the open window of the carriage reassured them, and arrested the attack of the lackeys. A beautiful and very grand-looking lady was smiling from it on them, and they all felt pleased in the strange light of that smile.

"The boy with the golden hair, I think," said the lady, bending her large and wonderfully clear eyes on little Leum.

The upper sides of the carriage were chiefly of glass, so that the children could see another woman inside, whom they did not like so well.

This was a black woman, with a wonderfully long neck, hung round with many strings, of large variously-colored beads, and on her head was a sort of turban of silk, striped with all the colors of the rainbow, and fixed in it was a golden star.

This black woman had a face as thin almost as a death's-head, with high cheek bones, and great goggle eyes, the whites of which, as well as her wide range of teeth, showed in brilliant contrast with her skin, as she looked over the beautiful lady's shoulder, and whispered something in her ear.

"Yes; the boy with the golden hair, I think," repeated the lady.

And her voice sounded sweet as a silver bell in the children's ears, and her smile begulled them like the light of an enchanted lamp, as she leaned from the window, with a look of ineffable fondness on the golden-haired boy, with the large blue eyes; insomuch that little Billy, looking up, smiled in return with a wondering fondness, and when she stooped down, and stretched her jeweled arms towards him, he stretched his little hands up, and how they touched the other children did not know; but, saying, "Come and give me a kiss, my darling," she raised him, and he seemed to accord in her small fingers as lightly as a feather, and she held him in her lap and covered him with kisses.

Nothing daunted, the other children would have been only too happy to change place with their favored little brother. There was only one thing that was unpleasant, and a little frightened them, and that was the black woman, who stood and stretched forward in the carriage as before.

She gathered a rich silk and gold handkerchief that was in her fingers up to her lips, and seemed to thrust ever so much of it, fold after fold, into her capacious mouth, as they thought to smother her laughter, with which they seemed convulsed, for she was shaking and quivering in a most unusual manner, and her eyes, which remained uncovered, looked gaggier than they had ever seen eyes look before.

But the lady was so beautiful, they looked on her instead, and she continued to caress and kiss the little boy on her knee, and smiling at the other children she held up a large russet apple in her fingers, and the carriage began to move slowly on, and with a sud inviting them to take the fruit, she dropped it as the wind from the window, it rolled some way beside the wheels, they following, and then she dropped another, and then another, and so on. And the same thing happened to all; for just as either of the children who ran beside had caught the rolling apple, somehow it slipped into a hole or ran into a ditch, and looking up they saw the lady drop another from the window, and so the chase was taken up and continued till they got, hardly knowing how far they had gone, to the old crossroad that leads to Owney. It seemed that there the horses' hoofs and carriage wheels rolled up a wonderful dust, which being caught in one of those eddies that whirl the dust up into a column, on the calmest day, enveloped the children for a moment, and passed whirling on towards Lisnavoura, the carriage, as they fancied, driving in the centre of it, and suddenly to be subsided, the straws and leaves floated to the ground, the dust disappointed itself, but the white horses and the lackeys, the gilded carriage, the lady and their little golden-haired brother were gone.

At the same moment suddenly the upper rim of the clear setting sun disappeared behind the hill of Knockdoulah, and it was twilight. Each child felt the sensations like a shock, and the sight of the rounded summit of Lisnavoura, now clearly overhanging them, struck them with a new fear.

They screamed their mother's name after him, but none other was there to the cabin door. At the same time they thought they heard a hollow voice say, close to them, "Go home."

Looking around, and seeing no one, they were scared, and hand in hand, the little girl crying fretfully, and the boy shrinking as taken from sleep, they trotted homeward, at their best speed, to tell, as we have seen, their strange story.

Molly Ryan never more saw her darling. But something of the lost little boy was seen by his female playmates.

Sometimes, when their mother was away, earning a trifle at hay-making, and Nelly weeding the potatoes for their dinner, or "beetling" clothes in the little stream that flows in the hollow close by, they saw the pretty face of little Billy peeping in archly at the door, and smiling silently at them, and as they ran to embrace him, with cries of delight, he drew back, still smiling archly, and when they got out into the open day he was gone, and they could see no trace of him anywhere.

This happened often, with slight variations in the circumstances of the visit. Sometimes he would peep for a shorter time, sometimes for a shorter time, sometimes his little hand would come in, and, with beaded fingers, beckon them to follow; but always he was smiling with the same arch look and wary silence, and always he was gone when they reached the door. Gradually these visits grew less and less frequent, and in about eight months they ceased altogether, and little Billy, irretrievably lost, took rank in their memories with the dead.

One wintry morning, nearly a year and a half after his disappearance, their mother having set out for Limerick, soon after cockcrow, to sell some fowl at the market, the little girl, lying by the side of her elder sister, who was fast asleep, just at the gray of the morning heard the latch lifted softly, and saw little Billy enter and close the door gently after him. There was light enough to see that he was barefoot and ragged, and looked pale and famished. He was straight to the fire, and covered over the turf embers, and rubbed his hands slowly, and seemed intent on some he gathered the smouldering turf together.

The little girl clutched her sister in terror and whispered.

"Waken, Nelly, waken; here's Billy come back!"

Nelly slept soundly on, but the little boy, whose hands were extended close over the coals, turned and looked toward the bed, it seemed to her, in fear, and she saw the glare of the embers reflected on his thin cheek as he turned toward her. He rose and went, on tiptoe, quickly to the door, in silence, and let himself out as softly as he had come in.

After that, the little boy was never seen more by any one of his kindred.

"Fairy doctors," as the dealers in the preternatural, who in such cases were called in, are termed, did all that in them lay—but in vain. Father Tom came down, and tried what holier rites could do, but equally without avail. So little Billy was dead to mother, brother and sisters; but no grave received him. Others whom affection cherished, lay in holy ground, in the old churchyard of Abington, with headstone to mark the spot over which the survivor might kneel and say a kind prayer for the peace of the departed soul. But there was no landmark to show where little Billy was hidden from their loving eyes, unless it was in the old hill of Lisnavoura, that cast its long shadow at sunset before the cabin door; or that, white and filmy in the moonlight, in later years, would occupy his brother's place as he returned from fair or market, and draw from him a sign and a prayer for the little brother he had lost so long ago, and was never to see again.

THE AUTUMN OF LIFE.—For there is a sadness about the fall of the blossom, even though it was not all meet, even though we have stored the fruit to which it aims. The poetry of life goes, in great measure, (excepting for swallow-flights of return,) when life's Spring and early Summer have fled; and a dull prosaic routine seems to have settled upon most lives after they have left us. Then Autumn—the fruit sometimes remembers the old blossom-beauty, and turns into color—not those delicate fairy-tints—but richer, more decided, mature. And so be content, and be not overanxious. O grave mutterers! the man, coming out of your graveries and stored fruits into the lovely Spring landscape, See, you are dry and grizzled now, and age, as with hoary lichen, is making your head gray; but once for you also the Spring airs were blowing, once for you also came that strange stirring of the sap, that innumerable bursting into bud, into blossom; that idea and thought (graceful in its uselessness, however unpractical and barren) of living only in the Springtime, only for beauty and love, and not for sordid fruit. Once for you, also was that undoubting anticipation of feeling over the first rush and energy of being that could not but crowd the boughs with a thousand graceful thoughts, loves, schemes, hopes, too frail, indeed, even to last through the Summer airs, far more the rough wind, and weather that lurked in the later year. And remembering all this, I know you will relax your severe brow and let the Spring orchards bloom their brief hour unreproved.—London Society.

THE SHADOWS OF THE FUTURE.—A most singular chain of circumstances preceded the assassination of that excellent monarch, HENRY IV., of France. In the morning of the day on which he was murdered by RAVAILLAC, Friday, May 14, 1610, he was exceedingly pensive. In the hope of composing his spirits he threw himself on his bed, but was unable to rest. Thrice he rose, and thrice he fell on his knees in prayer. Soon after, repairing to the presence chamber, his attendants endeavored to divert the melancholy which preyed so deeply on his mind. Being naturally amiable and cheerful, he tried to fall in with the well-meant pleasantry of his nobles, and attempted to smile, but concluded thus, "We have laughed enough for Friday; there will be weeping on Sunday."

His Queen, MARIE DE MEDICIS, had been crowned but the day before. LA BROSSE, a physician, is, by some, reported to have said to the Duke de VERNOUIS on that evening, "If the King survives a danger which threatens him at present, he will live three thirty years." The Duke, entreated the King to grant this physician an audience, and repeated what the old gentleman had been saying. His Majesty, with unusual asperity and hastiness, replied, "He is an old fool for telling you such things, and you are a young one if you believe him." The Duke's rejoinder was given respectful and sensible: "Sire, one may not believe such things, but one may fear them." BAYLE, however, has endeavored to shake the credit of this whole story.

The same day as the King and Queen were walking through an apartment of the palace, the King stopped to speak with somebody present. The Queen stopping at the same time, he said to her, as by a spirit of involuntary prophecy, "Go on, go on, Madame the Regent." A few nights before the entertainment of the Queen, all the jewels in the town were changed into pearls, and that she was told pearls were significative of tears. Another night she started and cried out in her sleep, and waked the King, who, asking her what was the matter, she answered, "I have had a frightful dream; but I know that dreams are mere illusions." "I was always of the same opinion," said HENRY; "however, tell me what your dream was?" "I dreamed," continued she, "that you were stabbed with a knife under the short ribs." "Thank God!" added the King, "it was but a dream." On the morning of the fatal day His Majesty was as we have before observed, unusually low. More than once he said to those about him, "Something or other hangs very heavy on my heart." Before he entered his carriage he took leave of the Queen no fewer than three times, and had not passed through many streets ere RAVAILLAC gave him that fatal thrust which deprived France of one of the most generous and humane sovereigns she ever had.—Dublin University Magazine.

The Prussian Excavations in the Stadium, at Athens.

The latest news of the Prussian excavations in the Stadium, in Athens, contained in letters from Dr. ERNST CURTIUS, were communicated at a recent meeting of the Archæological Society of Berlin. The issue sanctionable has now been almost fully cleared down to the ancient floor, and the parapet, which is four feet high, is well preserved. It is now also clearly ascertained that the entrance through the cave did not lead to the stadium, but merely into the corridor. Among the circumstances connected with the discovery of the sculpture, Dr. CURTIUS mentions several [illegible] have [illegible] another direction. Thus there was found in the stadium quite recently, a beautifully preserved colossal head of Hadrian, with the features of youthful, beardless, almost laughing, the other portraits represent a Roman above the age of thirty, showing the normal measures. A well-preserved [illegible] in the vicinity, and a portrait of Antinous, one of Hadrian's favorites, represented in the form of a god, of the [illegible] Dionysus, as well as a portrait of Antinous, one of Hadrian's favorites, represented in the form of a god, of the [illegible] Dionysus, as well as a portrait of the emperor Hadrian

EUROPE.

The decision of the High Court of France, in the case of Prince BONAPARTE, was published yesterday in Paris, and is more serious than was at first supposed. He is adjudged to have committed homicide on the person of VICTOR NOIR, and to have attempted the homicide of FOURNIER. The order of the Court places the Prince under article 304 of the Penal Code, the punishment of which is death, unless extenuating circumstances are shown, in which case the sentence can be lessened by two degrees. The trial will take place at Tours....The Prefect of the Paris Police has forbidden the usual street parade on Shrove Tuesday....The appointment of M. PARADOL as French Minister to Washington, is said to be delayed by the remonstrances of "unemployed diplomats."....The Carlist Committees in Spain are said to be vigorously at work and extending their operations to the frontier of the country. The Madrid Imparcial says that several chiefs have recently left France and have entered the north of Spain. It is reported that General RAMON CABRERA, the Carlist leader, refuses to command the movement unless regular forces are organized and a basis of operations decided upon....The Duke of MONTPENSIER has written a letter which has been published in which he says that "Spain is his country by tradition, adoption and affection."....An exciting discussion has occupied the attention of the Prussian Parliament for the last few days in relation to the policy of Count BISMARCK, which was bitterly attacked by many members.....A Berlin dispatch states that the old officers of the North Parliament have been reflected. ....The London Saturday Review of yesterday notes approvingly the acceptance of the new Land bill by the Irish members of the House of Commons. The writer thinks the Irish people will also accept it, unpalatable though it may be, as the first step of Reform. The Irish Press still denounce the measure....Copious extracts of the report of Mr. ARCHIBALD, British Consul at this City, in regard to the American tariff question, are published in the London Pall Mall Gazette of yesterday. In the report it is stated that "a tardy gradual reduction of the tariff is all that can be hoped for."....The Spectator of yesterday contains an article in reference to Canadian independence, in which it is stated that England might let Canada be free, but that "she is as loath to part with her empire as was the United States to part with the Southern Confederacy."....The rowing match between SAULES and HEARNE has been postponed, owing to the extreme cold weather, until the 28th inst.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate yesterday resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, asking for a general removal of political disabilities in the State, were received and laid over. Bills were introduced relative to unexpended appropriations and for the disposal of useless military reservations. The resolution for the return of certain private papers to the family of ex-President JEFFERSON was reported from Committee and passed. The annual Post Route bill, and the House bill providing for an appropriation of $2,000 to defray the expenses of investigating the alleged sale of cadetships, were both passed. Mr. SUMNER, by consent, addressed the Senate upon the bill to regulate the hours of labor for Government employes, principally in reply to the recent speech of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The bill granting lands to aid in constructing a certain railway in Oregon was then taken up, and a discussion ensued upon the policy of granting public lands to build railways in the West. A resolution to strike out the land grants was defeated by a vote of 8 to 37, and the bill was then variously amended and passed. The Senate at 4 P. M. adjourned.

In the House, after some discussion as to the order of business, the consideration of the Appropriation bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole. An amendment providing for an appropriation of $61,000 to construct a branch mint at Carson City, Nev., was adopted, Mr. DAWES remarking that he should call the yeas and nays on it in the House. Pending action on an amendment appropriating $15,000 to the Board of Education the Committee rose. A bill was introduced to provide stay of execution in certain cases. It is intended as a measure of relief against the recent legal-tender decisions. A large number of petitions were presented. Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Rules, reported a new rule in regard to contested election cases, which provides that the Committee on Elections for this Congress shall consist of fifteen members, and that each contested election case shall be assigned to a special Committee of three of the General Committee, who shall consider it exclusively, and report their decision direct to the House. The rule was adopted. The House then again went into Committee of the Whole for general debate, and at 5:45 P. M. adjourned.

GENERAL.

Our news from San Domingo is that President BAEZ has received a communication from influential parties in Venezuela, asking his influence with the Government of this country in favor of the annexation of Venezuela to the United States.

At Baltimore, Md., on Friday, a colored boy named WM. COOK, aged 11 years, while playing with two other boys in a barn, placed a halter around his neck in sport, and stepping or falling from a bale of hay, hanged himself. Before he was rescued life was extinct.

A man named FRANK MONNIX was fatally stabbed by an opponent named RICHARD MCCRACKEN, at Wheeling, West Va., on Friday. The murderer was arrested and placed in the lock-up, but escaped during the night, and has not yet been recaptured.

The recent storm was very severe in the East, and occasioned much delay in travel, the tracks of the railways, in many instances, being washed away.

One JOHN C. CRONIN, while disputing with a stranger in the street in Philadelphia, on Friday night, on the subject of Fenianism, was shot and dangerously wounded.

The Monarch arrived at Annapolis on Friday evening, and anchored six miles out. Yesterday Captain CONNERELL, Governor CHAMBERLAIN, of Maine, and Captains WOOD and MCFARLAND came ashore, and were received by Secretary BOUTWELL and Commodore WORDEN, Superintendent of the Naval Academy. The party, accompanying the Secretary of the Navy, afterwards called on Governor BOWIE, where they were entertained.

CALVIN C. CLARK, of Bell County, Texas, while moving with his family to Little Rock, Ark., was shot and killed by a noted desperado named SAM HALSEY. CLARK had been active in assisting the Sheriff of Bell County in breaking up a gang to which HALSEY belonged, and was followed when he left the county. Large rewards have been offered for the arrest of the murderer.

A clerk in the Baltimore (Md.) Post Office named ROBERT DALE was arrested in that city yesterday, charged with robbing the mails. He was held to bail in the sum of $5,000.

LEONHARDT SCHWUND, convicted of the murder of CONRAD STARK, and ROSANNA ROGERS, convicted of manslaughter, were both sentenced at Newark, N. J., yesterday, the former to twenty years in the State Prison, and the latter to five months in the County Jail.

JOHN DONLON (61 years old) and PATRICK BERRAN, convicted at Rochester of murder in the second degree for different offenses, were sentenced to State's Prison for life. The wife of the former, who was implicated with her husband in his crime, was also found guilty and sentenced for fifteen years. ROWLAND DOBBIN, convicted of manslaughter, was at the same time sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

HAZLEHURST & BRIGGS' large country store, located at Minter, McLean County, Ill., was a day or two ago destroyed by fire, involving a loss of $60,000; insured for $20,000, mostly in Connecticut companies.

JESSE W. HEATH, City Register of St. Louis, Mo., died in that city yesterday.

A rumor is current in San Francisco, Cal., to which the attention of the authorities has been called, of an organization in that city to exterminate the Chinese on or before St. Patrick's Day. The body is said to consist of several associations, one of which numbers two thousand members. Brutal assaults on the Chinese are of daily occurrence.

The schooner Piper left San Francisco yesterday with blasting materials on board, to be used in removing the coral reef at the entrance of Midway Island Harbor, so as to make the island a coaling station for the China and Government steamers.

The number of Chinese now on the Pacific coast, in statistics furnished to the California Legislature, is given as 59,500.

The bricklayers, plasterers and stone masons of Albany have resolved to strike, the master builders having given notice of a reduction of wages, to go into effect on the 1st of March.

A case of death by abortion came before the Coroner in Brooklyn yesterday. The victim was MARY DONIGAN, of Haverstraw. The abortionist is unknown.

In the case of WOODRUFF and others vs. The Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company, to recover the value of forty bales of cotton consumed by fire, and reported in the TIMES of yesterday, the jury failed to agree on a verdict, and were discharged.

The vital statistics for the present week are as follows: Deaths, 517; marriages, 503; births, 930; still births, 42.

The Police made the following arrests during the past week: Saturday, Feb. 12, 190; Sunday, Feb. 13, 105; Monday, Feb. 14, 178; Tuesday, Feb. 15, 164; Wednesday, Feb. 16, 186; Thursday, Feb. 17, 196; Friday, Feb. 18, 198; total, 1,147.

Equal Rights Before the Law.

Prompt upon the assembling of its Legislature in special session, in compliance with the proclamation of Governor BUTLER, the State of Nebraska has, by an almost unanimous vote, ratified the Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. Thirty States have now through their Legislatures declared that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude." But the present Democratic Legislature of New-York has attempted to rescind the favorable vote of this State, and those who are now opponents of equal rights as during the war they were opponents of the coercion of the Southern States and the struggle to maintain the national supremacy, contend that, through the action of the Democratic members of the Legislature of Indiana who fled from the performance of their duties and sought to deprive the two Houses of a quorum when the vote upon the amendment was taken, the consent of that State has not been legally given. These pleas would not stand; yet—granting that there might be grounds for dispute concerning them, and not counting these States—the amendment has, through the vote of Nebraska, been ratified by twenty-eight States, and that is just the number necessary to render the ratification complete. Counting New-York and Indiana, we have thirty States whose votes have been recorded in the affirmative, and these States are:

Alabama,	Maine,	North Carolina,
Arkansas,	Massachusetts,	Ohio,
Connecticut,	Michigan,	Pennsylvania,
Florida,	Minnesota,	Rhode Island,
Georgia,	Mississippi,	South Carolina,
Illinois,	Missouri,	Texas,
Indiana,	Nebraska,	Vermont,
Iowa,	Nevada,	Virginia,
Kansas,	New-Hampshire,	West Virginia,
Louisiana,	New-York,	Wisconsin.

The States which are to go upon the record as opposing this final measure of reconstruction are seven in number, and they are now all under the control of the Democratic Party. They are:

California,	Oregon,	New-Jersey,
Maryland,	Delaware,	Tennessee,
Kentucky.

To sum up in a word: seven States refuse to ratify the amendment, and thirty, counting New-York and Indiana, ratify it; counting New-York and Indiana with the seven opposed, the amendment has been ratified by exactly the number of States required.

The Millennium of Democracy.

The tone in which some of the Democratic papers discuss the present divisions in their party will be satisfactory chiefly to political cynics. These journals are saying to each other, "after this little fuss is over we shall be better friends than ever. The World only wants to put certain men in comfortable places. We can easily arrange such an affair as this." Other mediators beg the Democrats to wash their dirty linen at home. A third section smiles at the whole affair, and persists in regarding it as a sham quarrel got up to put Republican papers on a false scent.

We need not say that none of these politicians has paused to ask how the public are affected by the recent discussions. The public is, in fact, regarded merely as a puppet to be handled at pleasure by any set of performers which happens to get hold of it. That the community can never be aroused to take any measures for its own defence is the settled conviction of the leaders in our City Democracy. We feel assured that they will find out their mistake some day, and the opposition which is now manifested to all politicians will assimilate the good little. The bulk of the Democrats really say to the Republican public, "Pray do not heed our apparent differences. They are only family misunderstandings. You need not flatter yourselves that you, a spiritless public, will derive any benefit from our wrangles." Of course the Democrats who talk thus mean what they pretend. But, between their fraudulent contracts, their mockery of Municipal Government, and their Judges who are bought and sold like oysters or clams, they have exhausted public forbearance. They are now walking on the edge of a volcano—and we hope and believe that they will soon tumble in, and so come to an appropriate end.

Mr. CERNAMEN's bill for abolishing the Police and other Commissions, is a juggle intended to deceive the public. The present method of appointing the Police Commission may not be so faultless as we could desire. But if the Commissions were elected by popular vote in this City, what sort of men should we see in power? If we had elections which were really honest, there might not be much cause for fear. We know, however, how the thing is managed now. "No party," says the Citizen and Round Table, "can live under the opprobrium that attached to the last Fall elections, and if the Democracy would carry the next national canvass, they must free themselves from all culpability in this matter." Thus wisdom cries in the streets, but who is there in Tammany to regard her? Frauds at elections increase the Democratic majority, and are introduced and invented for that express purpose. Can we expect unscrupulous leaders to throw away a temporary advantage in order to strengthen themselves in the future? What do they care for the future so that they can "feather their nests" now?

Mr. CERNAMEN's plan of electing Police Commissioners is, therefore, a snare. It is only another evidence of the intention of the Democracy to get the Police under their own control—the one thing necessary to render them absolute masters of the City. The Freer Charter must fall—that every one perceives. But its chief objects may be accomplished by roundabout schemes. "Stand by your own party," says the Albany Argus to the Democrats. We shall see what this "standing by" will come to before very long. When the Democrats have the Police of the City under their thumbs, farewell to the last remnants of social order! They have Judges enough and to spare now—so that the circle will be complete. We shall then have Police officers, as well as Judges, who are audacious enough to threaten to trump up false charges against any one who happens to be obnoxious to them. Ought we not to feel elated at such a prospect? Officers of justice will proclaim to honest citizens through foul and shameful channels that if they do not keep silence, scandalous accusations will be invented and published respecting them. In short, there is to be a huge system of intimidation and blackmailing. This is the Democratic Millenium. Complete immunity for criminals, destruction to honest men, the Police in league with ruffianism, and Judges walking about with hired bullies at their heels. Ought we not all to long earnestly for the arrival of this golden era?

Reform in Female Education.

The opening by the Board of Education of the long-expected "Female Normal School" in this City will suggest to them and the public certain improvements in female education which have been much needed here. There can be no question that the standard of girls' education is lower in New-York than it is in some other districts of our country, especially in New-England. So practically is this shown to be the fact, that our best printers, if they require well-trained female compositors or type-setters, must send to New-England for them, where the training in ordinary branches is so much more thorough. If a copyist is wanted, the Yankee woman is sure to be preferred to the native, as more accurate and better educated. If a primary school or school for children has a teacher's place to be filled, the best-fitted applicants are not the graduates of our own ward schools, but those from the Oswego or Albany normal schools. In fact, in "the open market," an Oswego teacher is worth fifty per cent. more than a New-York teacher. So deficient are our girls in the habits of trained attention and accuracy, that the accomplished master in wood engraving in the Cooper Union is about recommending to the trustees to give this important branch up—the girls having too little precision and thoroughness to enable them ever to succeed or to compete with men. Yet in Boston, similar branches have been followed by women with much success.

The painful fact is that with all our fine show of school buildings, and our millions spent on education, we do not give young girls in New-York a sufficiently thorough and careful training to fit them for the severe competitions of practical life. We fear the same deficiency is essentially true of our private schools also. Will this new normal school correct this fault? The Committee to whose care it is intrusted contains gentlemen of much intelligence and public spirit; but whether their selection of teachers and officers has been just such as to carry out the most advanced ideas on education, we have our doubts. We wait with some anxiety for the results.

The one great and palpable error of all our schools, public and private, for girls, is attempting to do too much. Nearly all important branches of knowledge have one or two foundation elements or principles, which, if they are thoroughly and familiarly known, will enable the student to understand all the practical portion of the science. The higher branches of mathematics are of no sort of use to the most of our students, while they have not familiarized themselves with the first principles of arithmetic and geometry. This is equally true of chemistry or natural history in general. A few broad principles well learned and applied will guide the mind hereafter, but a smattering of many only confuses. Then we object most strongly to the early beginning in education with abstractions—such as are the innumerable definitions and rules and so is especially grammar. These are all employments for mature intellects. To define well is one of the last fruits of thought and trained acuity; still to analyze speech into rules belongs to abstract and mature minds. Most of this sort of study with children is pure waste of time. The beginnings of instruction for both boys and girls must be with facts and the objects of the senses.

The greatest desideratum in teaching we fear we shall never see filled out in our schools, whether private or public; that is, the teaching of natural science naturally. If some teacher would only arise who could take any department of the natural world, flowers, for instance, or stones, or insects, or birds, or animalcula, or animals—and placing the objects before the child's mind, make it explore, step by step the structure, habits, relations, uses and peculiarities of this one class, and follow it up in natural order to others—the child itself investigating and at last classifying—he would be a benefactor and reformer of the profession. We should then have children beginning their training with the two faculties most natural to them to use, observation and memory, especially as relating to the natural world; for children are, without doubt, in a certain "hidden bond of sympathy" with animals and plants. The habit of observing gives accuracy, and classifying leads hereafter to reasoning and abstract thought. The teaching of geography has already begun to be reformed under the influence of the "object system" and Professor GUYOT. It ought always to be connected with natural history and natural divisions, so that a lesson in geography should be a trip amid foreign vegetation and foreign costumes and under new scenes of nature, which the scholar must describe.

Unlike many of our reformers of education, we believe in the value of the Latin. We think these young lady wood engravers, who are said not to attend closely enough to their work, would have been better engravers if they had been good Latin scholars. A good mastery of the Latin language gives a habit of precision, attention, nicety, elegance, and a practice in weighing nice distinctions in language which the study of no modern tongue can possibly give, besides all the training in taste, rhetoric, history and foreign habits of thought which is indirectly imparts. The fact that no European tongue (of practical use) expresses its grammar by case-endings, but by arrangement, makes their study a very different matter intellectually from that of Latin. Thus, every bright boy or girl can, before eighteen, learn easily two or three modern languages, besides Latin. If, however, a substitute were desired for it in our public schools, we should prefer German to French, as a better discipline.

Death in the Medicine Bottle.

The other day a lawyer was nearly killed by a dose of medicine which a druggist's assistant mixed for him in this City. Who cared? The druggist was not punished, and a hundred people may since have received a cup of poison instead of the healing draught. Boys will commit mistakes, especially if they are set to make up medicines without having the faintest idea of the difference between one drug and another.

But three days ago we recounted the story of a poor woman named MOULD, who came to grief through a "slight mistake" on the part of another druggist. He had only given her poison instead of physic—that was all. She died. We must not draw conclusions adverse to the worthy druggist from that fact. People ought to have stronger constitutions. If Mrs. MOULD had been made of cast iron, the wrong dose would not have killed her.

Scarcely a day goes over without some one being poisoned, or nearly poisoned, through the ignorance and incapability of druggists and their assistants. A man who takes a physician's prescription to be made up ought to watch the ignoramus behind the counter with fear and trembling. The life of his child, wife or friend may be sacrificed in a moment through gross carelessness. Who can guard against such "accidents?"

The Legislature could give us the necessary protection. It could pass a bill compelling druggists to employ persons of proved skill and experience, and prohibiting them, under severe penalties, from allowing medicines to be made up by any one who had not passed a recognized examination. The druggists of New-Jersey, enlightened people as they are, have met and voluntarily petitioned their Legislature for a bill to that effect. We need not say that the druggists of New-York have not followed their example. They find it pay better to take raw boys from the streets to dispense their deadly wares.

Of course there are many druggists in the City who might be trusted to any extent; if there were not, scarcely any of us who had ever gone to a doctor for help would be left alive. It is very hard for such men to rest under a stigma, because unscrupulous pretenders open a store, stick some colored bottles in the window, and sell arsenic for salts. Why do not the properly-qualified druggists meet together and ask the Legislature for a bill? They are well known to most physicians, and do a good business. Still they could afford to step in between the sick man and woman and sudden death. Root out the impostors. Let us at least have our medicine pure. Our food we cannot be sure of, but it is a little too bad to find that we have been cruelly deceived even in a nasty dose of physic.

The Postal Telegraph in Great Britain.

The purchase of the telegraph lines by the British Government was not consummated hastily, or without what seemed ample preparation for their successful management as an adjunct of the postal system. No pains were spared to insure success. The different systems—the Morse, electric and magnetic—were discussed, and the first of the three uniformly adopted. The manipulation, codes and instruments were arranged upon one uniform plan. Schools of instruction were opened, and "dummy" instruments issued for practice by Postmasters, their families and their clerks. And a set of rules was issued of the closest and clearest description.

But the results are unsatisfactory, for the system, if indeed not a total failure, realizes far less than was confidently claimed for it. Storms interfere with the wires, and there is, and has been from the beginning, defective insulation. These difficulties are not new in the history of telegraphing, of course, but, while the companies were able to cope with them, the Government appears to have failed to do so. We hear, further, that the lines become overloaded, and that there are vexatious delays in the transmission of news. It is but fair to allow that the business has very greatly increased. Still, one of the very purposes of the consolidation was to encourage this business, and now that it comes the managers ought to be able to meet it. But they do not. Nor is the failure in this respect either slight or doubtful. The Postmaster-General admits that the defects to which he calls attention have existed for almost the whole period of postal telegraphing, and that efforts to remedy them have so far not succeeded. There is no escape from the plain inference from all this. The companies may have been open to censure on many points, but the new system is still more so. If they did their work less faithfully than they ought, the Government shows itself incapable of providing improvements. The history of this postal-telegraph experiment is interesting both for its information and the warning it conveys.

A Word About Insanity.

A variety of occurrences tends to bring the subject of insanity prominently before the public. Disordered intellect, it is expected, will be the defence, when the perpetrators of most of the recent murders are brought to trial. Many people seem to feel outraged when this sort of defence prevails, but it proves, nevertheless, the most successful of all defences before that portion of the public that constitutes a jury. Prisoners thus escaping conviction should, however, at least be kept thereafter in some sort of confinement. Suicides and suicidal attempts attributable to derangement of the mental faculties, have, within a few weeks, attracted unusual attention; some, because connected with prior homicide, some from being the occasion of lawsuits in which life insurance companies unsuccessfully resisted the payment of policies, and others from the prominence of the parties themselves. An important will case, involving a bequest to the Cooper Union in a question as to the sanity of the testator, is interesting on account of the peculiar religious belief of the deceased, who asserted his own personal irresponsibility for his acts, and claimed direct communication with the Deity.

Perhaps, in consequence of the revelations last Fall, by the Legislative Committee for the Inspection of State Charities, in a report after two years of inquiry and compilation, setting forth the infamous management of some of our country almshouses and the revolting treatment of the insane poor in those institutions, Governor HOFFMAN has called the attention of the Legislature to the condition of this class of unfortunates, of whom he says, "None are so helpless, none for the most part so friendless." That Committee, it will be recollected, found over two hundred lunatics bound with ropes and chains, as well as otherwise vilely treated. Such disclosures, in the light of present knowledge and successful systems, indicate that a remnant still exists of an ignorance equal to that which believed in the miraculous powers of Saint Dympna, of Belgium, and recorded in sculpture upon her tomb,—the pavement of which has since been worn away by kneeling devotees,—the expulsion of a visible devil from the head of a maniac. The discovery not long ago in Leicestershire, England, of a poor relative of a Nottingham Magistrate, who, demented, but not raving, had been kept manacled and chained to a wall for sixty out of seventy-five years of his life, recalls the frightful descriptions of the London Bedlam, now one of the best managed asylums in the world, where, early in this century, an unhappy maniac was permanently pinioned and fastened to one spot by rivoted iron bars during a period of twelve years ending with his death.

It is a relief to turn from such records to the annual reports of the Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane. A method of cure less romantic, but not less zealous than that by which ASTOLF restored to ORLANDO FURIOSO his lost reason sealed up in a bottle, has enabled Dr. KIRKBRIDE to discharge patients cured during the past year in number more than one-third of the average which his hospital contained. Also, twice as many are pronounced "improved" and "much improved," as remain "stationary."

Strange to say, researches in mental philosophy and metaphysical science have contributed but little to the improved treatment of mental disease. Much is already realized as practical knowledge by deduction from modern physiological researches, microscopic and chemical investigations, the study of statistics and careful observation. There is abundant evidence that the composition of the blood, and the supply of phosphorus to the brain, bear definite relations to cerebral and mental conditions. The connection between a disordered stomach and a headache, between dyspepsia and low spirits, is not in a majority of instances more direct than the relation of physical disease to a clouded intellect. In the Pennsylvania Hospital, of the ascertained causes of insanity, various kinds of sickness and defective health constituted more than forty per cent. The next great special cause is intemperance, which is now in many respects regarded as a disease. The affections and passions contribute at least sixteen per cent, undefined mental anxiety more than ten, and troubles concerning business and means of support not over nine per cent.; while less than six per cent is attributed to religion, and only one and a half to intense study. A doubt as to the frequency of a near alliance between great wit and madness, is invariably justified by the class of statistics.

In a general way, the treatment that tends to prove mental disease would have served to prevent it; and the earlier it receives attention the better the success of remedial measures. Many and the most complete place within three months of commencement, to the system.

[illegible] Variety of Mental Manifestation.

[illegible] of proverbial and experimentative philosophy expended upon revelations of something startling. Their causes, their causes and their finality are cleaved by the cold steel of logic, and riddled with rhetorical hot shot, until how they happened becomes obscure, what they did is a mystery, and when they ended terms but a chapter of "historic doubts." Thus grave scholars become mere wanderers in the mists of uncertainty, and grave questions remain unsolved, and are as dark as Delphic oracles. The color of our first parents is still undetermined—some say that they were black, others that they were an agreeable brown, while Art, with celestial benignity, depicts them fair as angels. A heap of ancient bricks lies, it is said, upon the banks of Old Nile, which is all that remains of Babel, the landmark of a mental overturning whose form looms dimly from the shades of remote antiquity. But who shall say? Who built the pyramids? Who was the man with the iron mask? Who "wrote Shakespeare?" These are interesting if not important questions, involving revolutions in the various fields of history, of science and of literature. Who shall answer them? We make a theory, and it vanishes like a bubble in the sunshine. Our very legendary pets and aversions desert us. The "valuable information" of our childhood turns to dust and ashes on the lips. Saxon HAROLD did not die on the field from that fatal arrow, but was cured and went away to live to a good old age; RICHARD Crookback was reasonably straight, and on the whole a domestic creature; Bluff HAL, that victim of enthusiastic domesticity, was truly an estimable man, and much maligned; the apple of NEWTON is a myth, and the pebbles of DEMOSTHENES a fable.

One fact remains with regard to men and events—everything had a beginning. Only if from that point of time veracious chroniclers had set to work, and faithful custodians had succeeded them, the world would be better off in the records of its races. It is, however, all the more important, in these modern times, that when a revolution of any sort is set on foot, the fact be noted with care, for so shall we be blessed by inquisitive generations to come. To this end and with due reverence for the magnitude of the occasion, therefore, we announce the opening of a revolution in Japan. That ancient, polite, learned and ingenious nation is to be subjected to a social change of the most significant description. Japan has got its first piano. The Mikado possesses it. An Austrian attaché gave it to him. He had never seen one before, and was delighted with the sweet sounds discovered by the giver. He at once directed his wife to take lessons.

Who cannot imagine the stupendous consequence of this event? We read of the groves and gardens, of the stately ceremonial, of the social formalities of Japanese society. The stoic aristocracy of soul with which the Japanese gentleman will perform his last toilet, and solve his question of "to be or not to be" with the hari-hari knife; the dignitaries which the common people must not look upon; the mysterious worship; the endless formalities—these and many more attributes of a grave and lofty-mannered people, are the subject of many a sailor's story or traveler's romancing. And we wonder what the "merry row of ivories" can have to do with them. Much, doubtless. The piano—grand, square and upright—will lift its voice all over the land of fair Japan, ere long. When it sings, will the people dance? Think of it—a dancing Daimio! It is no laughing matter. A revolution has begun. An army of instructors and constructors will invade the cottage and the palace alike. Let the philosophers and historians commence their theories and theorems, their comments and their chronicles, so that the new revolution in the East be the subject of no historic doubts by future ages.

What to Relapsing Fever

Dr. MEREDITH CLYMER explained the character of a peculiar disease in this country in 1844; and in a communication to the Medical Record, a few days since, states that he is satisfied that the relapsing fever is the same as that which he observed and described then twenty-five years ago.

"In June, 1844, a ship arrived at Philadelphia from Liverpool with Irish emigrants, amongst whom there had been some sickness during the voyage. Fifteen were sent to the Philadelphia Hospital, and admitted into the medical wards under my charge. They were suffering from continued fever of a kind different from any that I had then seen. I thought that I recognized, by the published histories, the kind then prevailing epidemically in Scotland and England, and which had appeared in those countries in 1826. The correctness of my conjecture was soon established. In all these cases the access was sudden, with severe headache, vomiting, muscular soreness and joint pains, rapid pulse, hot skin, a livid tongue, with a creamy gray or yellowish coating, and red lip and edges, (though in a few cases the tongue and mouth membranes of the mouth were quite dry for several days,) enlarged spleen, no cutaneous eruption, and no eruption. In all there was much delirium from the outset, and the face had a peculiar frenzied look, like that of persons suffering with maniacal paroxysms. About the seventh day delirium ceased, with abundant sweats; the appetite became good, the convalescence was rapid, and the patient apparently entirely upon convalescence, though still complaining of muscular weakness, and the face was at a dusky yellowish hue. Now in the fourteenth day a second paroxysm came only comparatively in some cases with all the symptoms of the first, and lasting for five or six days, while in others it was slight, and passed off in thirty-six or forty-eight hours. So far as I know, there were no instances of a second relapse. None of the house physicians, or nurses, or other patients contracted the fever."

Professor AUSTIN FLINT, of the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, refers to the disease in his work on the Practice of Medicine, and agrees in the general features of the disease as described by Dr. CLYMER. In London, according to Dr. MURCHISON, the disease has increased. In New-York, up to this time, there have been about two hundred and fifty cases, almost entirely confined to the squalid and ill-nourished poor in certain "nests," which, to borrow a very forcible expression of Dr. ELISHA HARRIS, the Metropolitan Board of Health have "stamped out." The mortality, according to the official records of this City, in the two hundred and fifty cases, has been about one per cent; and when we take into consideration the character and condition of those who have suffered [illegible] WASHINGTON.

Land Grants to Railroads—Action in the Senate—The River and Harbor Appropriation—Amendments—Appropriations—The Cadet Investigation—The Alaska Seal Speculation.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19.—The question of subsidizing railroads by land grants in the future, was bitterly fought in the Senate to-day, on the bill to aid in the construction of the road from Portland, Oregon, to Astoria and Multnomah, in the same State, and was—so far, at least, as the present Congress is concerned. There had been for months so much discussion both in the newspapers, Press, and in Congress and outside of it, on subsidizing the railroads, which has heretofore obtained on this subject, that the fate of the bill to-day was looked forward to with some anxiety, as it would afford an indication of the intentions of the Legislative branch of the Government on this important branch of industry. The Democrats were very bitter in their opposition, and so in fact opposed the bill. Mr. THURMAN particularly made the most noticeable speech. His denunciations he brought against our railroad policy in the past, maintaining that the public domain had been presented to most corporations, and that in the future land would be as dear as it was in Europe and utterly beyond the reach of the poor man, owing to this worthless policy. It was no use, however. Other Senators took a more favorable view of the subject, and experienced Senators like Mr. HAMLIN, who considered the land grant rather doubtful, gave it, as their opinion, that the past course of the Government had been a wise one, and that it was the best possible means of developing the material resources of the continent. Amendment after amendment was offered by the Democrats to transfer the bill, but they were voted down as quickly as they were presented, and the measure was passed without many material changes.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Sub-Committee charged with the framing of a River and Harbor Appropriation bill, met this morning and mapped out their work. There was a general talk on the subject of the appropriations, and, of course, there was considerable diversity of opinion as to the amount to be appropriated. Some of the members were in favor of giving as much as possible for internal improvements, believing it to be often true economy.

THE SALE OF CADETSHIPS.

The investigation of the cadet transactions was continued this morning, and some additional light was thrown on the subject implicating one or two additional Congressmen. Mr. WARREN SOMS, who is one of the South Carolina delegation, was examined. His testimony was to the effect that he agreed to make a certain West Point appointment, and that shortly afterwards, without his knowledge or consent, $2,000 was sent into his district for campaign purposes. Mr. BROOKS, who was recalled, testified that he had made the arrangement with WARREN SOMS, and also that he paid Mr. BLACKBURN last year $2,500 for another appointment. One other witness was also examined. There is a great deal of feeling and indignation expressed here on the subject by Congressmen generally, and there is no doubt that the convicted members who are now in Congress will be expelled.

THE ALASKA SEAL FISHERIES.

The Alaska seal fisheries is a subject which excites some attention here at present, as it will soon become a topic of legislation. The Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of managing the business through agents of its own, and opposed to the propositions which have been made to the Department to lease or rent the fisheries, on the ground, among others, that it would create a monopoly. Some of the gentlemen who are desirous of making a contract with the Government and of obtaining mandatory legislation on the subject, will have a hearing before the House Committee of Commerce on Monday next. The Secretary of the Treasury will also come before the Committee at an early day to urge the adoption of his plan.

IN THE HOUSE.

When the House met this morning there was no quorum present, which necessitated a call of the House. The body then went into Committee of the Whole on the Legislative appropriation bill, on which the rest of the day was consumed.

A GRAND BALL ON THE 22D.

Some fifty or sixty of the leading business men of this city, who are fair representatives of its wealth and culture, propose to give a grand ball here on the night of the anniversary of Washington's birthday. Invitations have been sent to every Congressman; and as all the prominent officials are likewise included, the affair will probably be the grandest of the season.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

THE MISSISSIPPI BILL.

The members elect to Congress from Mississippi, with Senator-elect REVELS, made another visit to the Executive Mansion to-day, for the purpose of requesting the President to delay signing the Mississippi bill until after the passage of the bill removing political disabilities, which contains the names of certain members of the delegation; that the admission of the State before the removal of the disabilities of a portion of the delegation would deprive them of their seats. The President expressed his willingness to conform to the wishes of the delegation, and consequently the Mississippi bill has not yet been signed.

CURRENCY STATEMENT.

NAVY.

Lieutenant-Commander CHAS. HEARN is ordered to duty as Chief of Staff of the Southern Squadron of the North Atlantic fleet. Lieutenant-Commander H. SAMPSON is detached from duty at the Observatory and ordered to ordnance duty on Washington Navy Yard. Master F. M. WILSON is detached from the Minnesota and placed on waiting orders. Warren H. L. ROOSEVELT is detached from ordnance duty at New-York and ordered to the Alaska.

PERSONAL.

President GRANT has not intimated his intention to visit Annapolis during the stay of the ship Monarch at that place.

The Union League Club are making arrangements for the proper celebration of the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution, on the evening set of memorial day.

Important changes in the management of the New-York Hospital are announced. Rev. Mr. CHADBOURNE, who has been for fourteen years past one of its editors and proprietors, has retired, with the good wishes of all who have been associated with him during this time, and Rev. Dr. BELLOWS, formerly of Rochester, a rising man in the Presbyterian Church, has taken his place. The American Presbyterian, of Philadelphia, has been merged in the Hospital, and thus many new subscribers have been added to the list of the latter. Rev. HENRY M. FIELD remains junior editor and proprietor, and Dr. JOHN HALL and Rev. THEODORE L. CUYLER continue to contribute to each number.

In the list of "One Thousand Dollar Autographs" taken from Mr. THURLOW WEED'S autobiography, which was published in the TIMES of Friday, the name of JOHN F. WHEELOCK, Dow, was mistakenly given as Wheelock.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Week's Amusements.

The opera has been unusually attractive during the week at the Academy. "Rigoletto" was given on Monday with great results, and there was an unexceptionally satisfactory performance of "Faust" on Wednesday. Miss KELLOGG was better than ever as Marguerite, and Signor REGNA surprised the public by his excellent presentation of Méphistophélès. On Friday there was another representation of "Il Trovatore," and for the Saturday matinée a repetition of "Rigoletto." On Monday the latter work is to be given again, and on Wednesday we are promised "Robert le Diable."..... Niblo's Garden has been crowded to the doors this week to see Mr. FECHTER'S Hamlet, and, had it been possible so to arrange matters, we doubt not the tragedy could have been successfully repeated for an indefinite time. Our impressions of this remarkable performance have already been given at some length, and, as the public have continued to show more and more during the week that they are getting to be of the same mind with us, further observations in the way of eulogy seem at this time to be needless. We take occasion, however, to compliment Miss Le CLERCQ's pretty performance of Ophelia. In some respects her mad-scene is better than that of any other lady we have seen in the part for some years. Mrs. JOHNS is acceptable, although somewhat too heavy-footed in the Queen. Miss MORANT is exceptionally good in her character, and the compliment here is in favor of Booth's Theatre. Mr. SHEWELL'S Ghost is quite respectable, and Mr. LEVICK plays some parts of Ophelia admirably. Mr. BARNES as Laertes and Mr. RANKIN as Horatio have both appeared to advantage, and the play has been in all respects better put upon the stage than was anticipated. All should have their due, and it would be ungenerous to omit to say that the management of Niblo's, which has been censured for shortcomings in this wise before, achieved in the production of "Hamlet" quite as much as under the circumstances could have been expected of them. The piece was very well mounted, indeed, and, put for the exceptional splendor of Mr. BOOTH'S revival, would have struck the public eye even more favorably than it has. Last night Mr. FECHTER'S engagement at Niblo's terminated. After the curtain had fallen for the last time, he appeared before it thrice, and on his third appearance—unaccompanied, this time, by Miss Le CLERCQ, who had previously shared the applause that greeted him—he replied thus to the call for a speech: "In the language of SHAKESPEARE," he said, "I am poor in words. I will say as Hamlet says: 'Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks, but I thank you.'" Mr. FECHTER acts at the Boston Theatre to-morrow evening.... "Fros Fros" at the Fifth-avenue Theatre is becoming quite a brilliant success. The piece is really a very good one, and it is very nicely acted. Miss ETHEL has decidedly improved on her first night's conception of the heroine, and her Fros Fros is now in many respects worthy of warm commendation. A little more familiarity with the stage, greater certainty and aplomb, and the correction of a few provincialisms of speech will make this young lady an effective actress. She has fire, good looks and ambition, and with study and practice there is no reason why she should not ascend high in public favor. Her scene with Miss NEWTON—who is exceedingly good in Louise—is admirably worked up by both ladies, and has elicited each night the compliment of a recall. Mr. JAMES LEWIS helps amazingly to carry off the scenes of "Fros Fros" with spirit and laughter. His dress in the second act is something wonderful to behold. Some of the sets of the drama—that in Venice especially—are strikingly good and finished in detail, and if Mr. DALY keeps on at this pitch of excellence, his permanent success at the Fifth-avenue may be reckoned as almost assured.... At Wallack's "School" has been played to excellent business. The ensuing week is to be devoted to final repetition of each of the plays that have lately been so successful here, including "General Park" on Monday, "Ours" on Tuesday, "Masks and Faces" (for the second time this season) on Wednesday, and "The Captain of the Watch" and "Woodcock's Little Game" on Thursday. "Lost at Sea" will be the first novelty, and will probably be brought out to-morrow week. "Masks and Faces" we should add, was acted for the first time last evening, with even more than its wonted success. Mr. FISHER acted, as heretofore, James Triplet, which may be accounted his best rôle, and almost all the other male characters were assigned to the artists who embodied them last season. Miss MADELINE HENRIQUES resumed, to the general delight, the robes of Peg Woffington, and portrayed the kind-hearted actress with the alternate vivacity, simplicity and dignity the part exacts. Lady Mabel Vane was entrusted to Miss LOUISA MODJESKA, who is once more fortunate in the possession of a part in which perpetual plaintiveness is not out of place. The familiar completeness of detail was observable, of course, in the whole entertainment.... Nothing interrupts the prosperous career of "Hamlet" at Booth's Theatre; and this noble and most creditable revival promises to yield an adequate reward to the manager, who to his own honor and that of the Drama, has had the enterprise so to produce it. The expense of getting up the piece was necessarily very great, and we rejoice that the money has not been expended in vain.... The travesty of "Hamlet" has achieved a very great success at the Olympic Theatre, where it will be acted until further notice.... The regular Saturday evening entertainment at the Theatre Français took place yesterday. A burlesque on "Faust" was performed, M. EDGARD winning the largest share of laurels for a most comical personation of GOETHE'S hero.... We trust our readers will not forget the Grand Testimonial Concert of next Tuesday night, for the benefit of the widow and family of the late MARIANO MARZOCCHI. The performance will be an extraordinarily fine one, as may be judged from the list of those who are to assist in it. Among these are Mme. ANNA BISHOP, soprano; Miss CLARA LOUISA KELLOGG, soprano; Mrs. JENNIE KEMPTON, contralto; Miss FRIDA DE GERSDE, contralto; Herr HABELMANN, tenor; Signor LOTTI, tenor; Signor BONCHEI, baritone; Signor BANDOLFI, baritone; Signor POSSATI, basso; Mr. S. B. MILLS, piano; Mr. EDWARD MOLLENHAUER, violin solo; Mr. G. W. MORGAN, organ; Dr. DERN, organ; Mr. MORA, organ. CHARLES FRADEL will be the accompanist at the organ, MAX MARETZEK the director and conductor, and Miss ADELAIDE MARZOCCHI will also appear.... Mr. HAYTS has fitted up a Bijou Theatre at No. 728 Broadway, which is said to be a perfect model of ROBERT HOUDIN'S, in Paris, and at which a series of musical entertainments of an elegant character will begin to-morrow evening, Monday, Feb. 21.

BROOKLYN CHORAL UNION.

Mr. DODSWORTH and the well-trained phalanx of vocal and instrumental performers controlled by his baton, have the satisfaction of knowing that a public of hundred musical enthusiasts now exists in Brooklyn, and are at all times ready to give a delighted attention to the truly artistic entertainments provided for them. Last night's performances was no exception to the successful series of Choral Union Concerts. The work selected for interpretation was one that seldom fails to command the appreciation of a popular audience. The progress from formless chaos to perfect and harmonious cosmos which forms the argument of "The Creation," has been depicted in what are, perhaps, the most exquisitely expressive and eloquently descriptive melodies to be found in the entire répertoire of the Oratorios. The solo parts were sustained by Mme. HAUK, Mr. GEO. SHERWOOD and Mr. F. L. DALLOW. It would be exaggerated praise to say that all the stores of the melodious riches of the mind of HAYDN'S great work were amply displayed by the trio of artists. It is not, however, too much to aver that their efforts were marked by an amount of careful and conscientious precision, and an absence of any attempt at florid embellishment, which were highly commendable. Special and well-deserved applause was bestowed on Mme. HAUK for the rendering of the aria "With Verdure Clad." Mr. DALLOW gave a very admirable treatment of "Now Heaven in fullest glory Shines," and Mr. SHERWOOD fairly excelled himself, and brought down an enthusiastic encore by his splendid manner in the difficult aria "In Native Worth." The chorus chosen exhibited an amount of excellence which speaks volumes for the study and attention of the singers. There is an obvious heartiness and devotion to their work about the ladies and gentlemen of the Brooklyn Choral Union which is pleasant to see, and which exerts the natural effect upon their performance. The exceptionally rich orchestral beauties of "The Creation" were very faithfully rendered by the select corps of metropolitanists under the leadership of Herr ERNI, and the organ was kept, by Mr. CAULFIELD, under that judicious subjection which can only be fully understood by the true artist.

SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

At the tenth popular concert of the Y. M. C. A., yesterday afternoon, Mozart, MULLER, HILL and BERGNER, with Miss STERLING, were the artists. Mr. BERGNER played the adagio movement from the concerto which he is to execute at the next Philharmonic Concert. Miss STERLING is always a favorite, while Mr. HILL is an acceptable tenor. Mr. MULLER showed good taste in confining the organ to the classic school, which it is so well fitted to interpret, and we think that SCHUMANN or HAYDN would give more pleasure to and be better understood by the audience than BACH or RINCK. For the next concert Miss HOWARD PAUL, Mr. EMPI, the flutist, and Mr. NILSEN, a Norwegian candidate for the honors of the concert room, are announced. We may add that the audience yesterday afternoon was a large one, and also that Signor CARTERMEL, though advertised, did not appear.

Miscellaneous Notes.

AN original adaptation of GOETHE'S "Faust" is about to be acted in North Adams, Mass., and Mr. W. H. FOTE is to fill the leading part.... Mrs. NELLIE ANDERSON, wife of J. H. ANDERSON, is dead.... CHARLES DURAND died last week in Philadelphia at the advanced age of 72 years. To those of a former generation the deceased was known as an accomplished actor, while in latter years he has furnished the link between the past and the present in a history of the Philadelphia stage, dating from its earliest days down to our own times.... The marriage of Miss SUSAN A. GALTON to Mr. A. KELLERMAN is recorded in the Philadelphia papers.... WOLFSOHN gave a "Chopin matinée" in Philadelphia on Friday.... Mr. E. L. DAVENPORT acts in "Enoch Arden" in Troy to-morrow night.... Mr. LESTER WALLACK acts in Hartford on March 16 and 17.... The following highly interesting correspondence explains itself:

BOSTON, Feb. 14, 1870.

Mr. Stuart Robson:

DEAR SIR: Can you play Hamlet? T. B.

The baggage of LINGARD and troupe are reported to have been seized on an attachment issued in Cleveland.... Mr. WILLIAM FLETCHER, comedian, died last week in Vicksburg, aged 38 years.... The Bishings Opera Troupe sing in Nashville this week.... LOTTA was at the St. Charles Theatre in New-Orleans last week.... Miss PATTI made her début in New-Orleans on Feb. 14.... Mr. JEFFERSON will not visit New-Orleans this year. .... OLE BULL was serenaded in San Francisco on Feb. 4.... At latest advices eight hundred singers were rehearsing for the festival at San Francisco. Three thousand in all will participate in it.

The Foreign Drama.

NOVEL PERFORMANCE OF HAMLET.

"A very singular attempt," says the London Times, "is made by Mr. J. M. BALLEW to give an entirely new aspect to the species of entertainment commonly known as a 'reading.' While our great novelist, by simply reading his own works, is attracting crowds to St. James' Hall, Mr. BALLEW is clearly of opinion that the effect of a reading may be greatly heightened by the employment of those very accessories which seem foreign to the nature of this species of entertainment. Standing in the orchestra of St. George's Hall, he reads a large portion of 'Hamlet,' while the business of the play is carried on by a company of actors who follow his words not only with appropriate gesticulation, but with a mute motion of the lips. That the theory on which this exhibition is based is fallacious can scarcely be questioned by any one who impartially reflects on the subject. A lady moving her lips while a gentleman with a deep voice speaks the words she is supposed to utter produces no illusory effect, and throughout the performance the attention of the spectator is divided between the gesticulating actor and the reader, who gesticulates likewise. A more moderate spirit of eclecticism would have suggested the occasional introduction of a tableau as a relief to the reading where a pictorial effect was to be obtained; but Mr. BALLEW, it should be clearly understood, goes far beyond this. The actor accompanies the reader even in soliloquies, and though the curtain occasionally descends, and leaves the latter in the undivided force of his elocution, this obviously occurs for the mere sake of resting the mute performers, and does not necessarily indicate the preparation of a striking picture. While dissenting utterly from the principle on which this novel entertainment is based, we are bound to speak in high commendation of the manner in which the principle, fallacious though it be, is carried out. The parts of the performance which respectively address the ear and the eye do not harmonize with each other, but each in itself is admirable. On the one hand, Mr. BALLEW'S 'reading' is so impressive, so original, so full of passion and pathos, that the spectators may well feel inclined to wonder that such a matter of elocution should have allowed a thought about accessories to enter his mind, and to close his eyes to prevent his attention from being distracted by the action on the stage. On the other hand the tableaux, considered as tableaux, are exquisitely beautiful, and, like the reading, are redolent of genius and research. New views of costume are embodied, new groups are devised, tradition is disregarded, and it is not too much to say that such an illustration of "Hamlet" was never witnessed in a theatre. Mr. BALLEW is a stickler for text, but one of his innovations is scarcely consistent with Shakespearean purism. Adapting from REED'S edition the line,

'The glow-worm shows the matine to be near,' he not only terminates the interview with the Ghost by making Hamlet and his friends enter the door of a church, where they are received by a monk, but he substitutes the latter portion of the dialogue with a Latin hymn of St. Ambrose, which is sung by a chorus behind the scenes, and the words of which are circulated among the audience, as throwing new light on the Ghost's speech. The notion is very ingenious, and there is no violence in assuming that when Hamlet says, "I will go pray," he means to visit a church. But it is quite certain that SHAKESPEARE did not contemplate the introduction of St. Ambrose's hymn, or the appearance of a monk. Will this singular experiment succeed? Here is a question hard to answer. There are so many parvenus in this country who run after everything fashionable, even in theatre itself, that this approximation to a theatre, which may be compared to the position of an aspirantic country may prove powerfully attractive to a large class. But it will not serve as a precedent for other experiments of the kind. Based on a fallacious theory, it is a splendid mistake. Another application of the theory would be the mistake without the splendor."

THE FRENCH STAGE.

M. LATOUR SAINT-YVARS, who has written for the stage for some thirty years, and was fortunate enough to have two of his plays illustrated by the genius of the late Mlle. RACHEL, reappears as the author of "L'Alchemiste," a five-act drama in verse, recently brought out at the Odeon. The action takes place in the last days of the Roman Republic. The principal personage is Sarpédon, a freedmate, formerly the property of Pompey, who, by his wealth, his magnificence and his good and bad qualities, has become a leader of fashion and dandies, the son of Pompey, is the most illustrious of his followers. Servilie, Queen of Pontus, who has come to Rome to solicit assistance against her encroaching neighbors, is the object of universal admiration among the choice spirits of the town; and Sarpédon, who has already succeeded in winning from Servilie the affections of the queen, Tem Dent, wagers that he will gain the heart of the classical Queen without sacrificing himself to the inconvenience of loving her in return, the only obstacle of which he is aware being the conditions of a freedman. Accordingly, having confided Pompey to robbers into the country, by inspiring him with a draught of hying quick-silver, he proceeds to Servilie, who, in the character of a Roman lady, is the Queen of Pontus, and, by the exercise of his personal attractions, succeeds in winning her affections. Pompey returns, and

REDEEMING THE CITY.

The Work of Evangelizing the Bloody—History of Various Efforts in New-York for the Past 240 Years—What Has Been Accomplished by the City Mission.

It is often worth while to review the initial step in a great undertaking, the small beginnings of a great fortune or an extensive business, the feeble and comparatively inadequate causes of great results. The hundred dollar pittance was the commencement of that money-making career that is now memorialized in bronze on the front of the railroad depot in Hudson-street. HARPER started his express business with a carpet bag, in which he carried all the freight offered for the first week between New-York and Boston. ASTOR began with a colored boy and a wheelbarrow; the business in whose millions of dollars of capital are now carefully and profitably invested. STEWART, with a few hundred dollars' worth of laces, laid the foundation of the greatest shopping marts in the world.

In enterprises of a moral and religious nature we see many illustrations of the power of Divine majesty growth from tiny seeds, and grand developments from very small beginnings. The history of benevolent work in New-York commences with the earliest Dutch settlement, nearly 2[illegible] years ago. When the good people from Holland crossed the ocean and lived upon Manhattan Island as the land of their choice, and bought it of the Indians for $24, they at once proceeded to erect a fort and a mill and houses of habitation, and at the same time, being mindful of their religious needs and obligations, they appointed one of their number to visit the sick, to read and pray with them, and on the Sabbath to hold religious services in a room over the mill. And these two missionaries of 1642 may properly be considered as types and representatives of the far preachers, City missionaries and Bible readers of modern times.

From that early period, onward through all the subsequent history of New-York, we often meet with traces of evangelistic zeal and benevolent movements. Pastors of churches and active laymen, seeing many around them who visited no sanctuary, and who seemed regardless of the Sabbath and their religious and moral duties, felt constrained to devise ways and means of doing them good.

Soon after the close of the American Revolution and the restoration of peace, while the City was slowly recovering from the paralyzing effects of a tedious and wasting war, the Christian people of New-York were organizing missionary societies to carry the Gospel to the destitute in the outskirts of the City and in the new settlements in the State, and prominent in these movements we find the names of Rev. Drs. RODGERS, MCKNIGHT, ASHLEY, LIVINGSTON and MASON, famous men in their day. And the women, too, of that period were ready then, as they ever have been, to co-operate in all suitable ways in forwarding every work of love and mercy. Miss ISABELLA GRAHAM, and others of like spirit, were seen going every Sabbath afternoon to the Almshouse and the Bridewell, then in the back of Chambers-street, to teach the poor children and others the simple truths of Christianity. The fervent piety and practical sagacity of that wise and excellent mother in Israel, also bore fruit in the formation of the Orphan Asylum, and other charitable institutions which remain to this day.

With the commencement of the present century the spirit of Christian activity became more alert and aggressive, and pioneer efforts under the leadership of Rev. WARD STAFFORD and others at Manhattan Island, Stuyvesant and Corlaer's Hook, on the easterly side of the City, were eminently successful, and resulted in the formation of the Seventh Presbyterian and other churches, which have long been known for their activity and usefulness in that part of the City.

In the great awakening of 1820-30, particularly in connection with the labors of HARLOW PAGE and his associates, there was a new interest created in the direction of personal effort for individuals, and A. B. WETMORE, MOSES ALLEN and others gave an impulse to the movement, which resulted in engrafting upon the City Tract Society the City missionary system, which has been continued in active operation for forty years, having enlisted 130 different missionaries, and expended $70 years of missionary service during that time.

With the opening of the year 1854 the directors of the City Mission undertook an expansion of their means and agencies, called into their Board Monnis K. Jesup, Wm. E. Dodge, Jr., and others of the younger active business men, rented an office in the Bible House, and appointed one of their number, LEWIS E. JACKSON, who had for many years been identified with their operations, the Corresponding Secretary. And now commenced the preparation of the reports, documents and papers, which have been widely distributed and have been largely instrumental in awakening and directing Christian zeal and activity in special efforts among the poor and neglected in this and in other cities. One of the Secretary's articles on Home Evangelization, published in the Journal of Commerce May, 1854, arrested the attention of JAMES L. SCHIEFFELIN, who voluntarily offered $5,000 as the commencement of a fund for building mission chapels. The City Mission now has three handsome, commodious chapels and a good parsonage, property in all worth $[illegible],000, entirely free and unincumbered. In 1856 the Society was reorganized and incorporated, and an Executive Committee of fifteen pastors and laymen, headed by Rev. Dr. HOWARD CROSBY, was appointed to carry forward the practical operations of this important work.

At this time Rev. GEORGE J. MINGINS, well known for his successful labors in connection with the United States Christian Commission, was invited to become the Superintendent of Missions, to give instruction and direction to the missionaries, to organize missions and services, and to present the claims of the cause in church, Sabbath schools and public meetings. During the four years past in which the Society has been running on its new and enlarged basis, over $200,000 have been raised and expended for the support of missionaries and the general work, and more than $100,000 have been subscribed towards the erection of mission chapels. The members of the Executive Committee, while giving much of their valuable time and personal attention to the careful supervision of the active work of City evangelization, furnishes a full statement of the charitable and religious work of the Metropolis, a complete directory to the churches, and ministers, and missionaries in attendance, and a great number of interesting facts and figures concerning the population, &c., embracing altogether in one volume valuable information that can be found in no other pub-

MILITARY GOSSIP.

The Adjutant-General has taken a decided and favorable stand on the question of breech-loading muskets for the National Guard. The system of tactics at present in use by the Regular and National Guard forces is peculiarly adapted to the use of breech-loaders, and all our first-class regiments should be equipped with them. As Adjutant-General Townsend says in his last report, the plan of altering the present flint-lock musket into the breech-loader is rather an expensive one. He expends that it would be better to get the War Department to exchange them for the "Springfield breech-loading rifle musket," model of 1866, which is the model of 1861 altered for loading at the breech, with the barrel reduced in calibre to .50 and in length to thirty-six inches, and having a new back sight for aiming at distances ranging up to 1,000 yards, and also an improved ramrod.

It is understood that General Geo. B. McClellan will address several of the regiments in the First Division, some time next month, on the subject of organization, discipline, and kindred matters of interest to military men. These lectures will, no doubt, be largely attended.

Captain W. H. Cox and his warrie men of Company B, Thirty-seventh Regiment, gave their annual reception and hop at the regimental armory, corner of Broadway and Thirty-fifth-street, on Thursday evening last. The rooms were tastefully and appropriately decorated, and the Committees were unremitting in their attentions. Colonel Freeborn, Lieutenant-Colonel Duesberry and other leading officers of the Thirty-seventh were present during the evening, and the ball was attended by a large and fashionable assemblage.

The right and left wing drills of the Twenty-second Regiment have been postponed until the 25th inst. and 4th prox. As usual these drills will be private.

The members of Company H, Ninth Regiment, Chas. M. Schiefflin commandant, announce, on handsome cards, that their annual hop will take place on Friday evening next, at Lyric Hall, No. 724 Sixth-avenue, when they anticipate a very pleasant time.

The controversy between Captain O'Rourke and the masked warrior of the Third Brigade, on swordsmanship, seems to have suddenly ended in silence. Can it be possible that the combatants are no more?

The Board of Officers of the Twenty-second Regiment are quite exercised at the mysterious disappearance of the Fourth Brigade furniture, which it appears they believed themselves heirs to. The smart question just now is, where has the furniture gone, or by whose orders was it removed? So far as we can understand, the matter, it is a very singular affair.

A correspondent inquires why the bayonet is not abandoned as a useless appendage to the rifle musket. The only reason for its retention, in our opinion, is the convenience of stacking. The fact that it is absolutely unnecessary in modern warfare is the opinion of many leading Generals both in America and Europe. The British army is now being furnished with a bayonet that is shaped like a sharp spade, and is nearly any heavier. The excellent use made of temporary earthen and stone breastworks in our late war has given European officers many a valuable hint.

The movement looking towards equipping the National Guard artillery with light mountain batteries is meeting with universal favor. These howitzers can be easily drawn and handled that they are peculiarly fitted for use in case of a protracted riot in this City, while the old and heavier field guns would prove a decided incumbrance, for the simple reason that there are no trained horses at hand. For grape and canister the ordnance, or the only proper gun, solid shot not being necessary, in case of civil disturbances.

Captain Wm. J. A. McGrath and a select Committee from Company G, Twenty-second Regiment, will leave to-morrow for Providence, R. I., for the purpose of presenting a series of handsomely engrossed resolutions to the First Light Infantry of Providence. The Committee will attend the reception and hop of their Providence friends on Tuesday evening, in full uniform, and return home on Wednesday.

The ball of the First Cavalry will take place to-morrow night at the Germania Assembly Rooms. A large number of balls and receptions will be given on Tuesday evening, in celebration of Washington's Birthday, by several National Guard organizations.

The fair of Company H, First Regiment, on Wednesday evening, resulted in considerable pecuniary benefit to the funds. There were 45 valuable prizes, four swords. Lieutenant-Colonel Mechlin and Captain Langheim and Captain Bartleman were the lucky recipients. Over 1,000 prizes were distributed, and the fair ended with a hop.

Major Edward Gilon, of the First Brigade, is now making a thorough inspection of the books and records in that command.

Great preparations are now in progress for the Thirteenth Reception, at the Brooklyn Fire Academy of Music, to-morrow evening. The decorations are to be chaste and appropriate, and Grafulla will have one hundred musicians under his baton.

Internal Revenue Returns—Income of Railroads, Theatres, &c.

The following statement shows the returns made by the various companies mentioned for the month of January. It will be seen that the gross receipts at Booth's Theatre reached the sum of $54,426, on which he paid a tax to the Government of $1,631. This is the largest return ever made by this theatre, but it does not come up to the returns made as the gross receipts of Niblo's Garden, the first three months of the "Black Crook." They stood as follows: October, 1866, $70,852; November, 1866, $69,000; December, 1866, $65,725. It is also worthy of notice that the receipts of the Third-avenue Railroad Company have steadily declined, during the past few months, from about $125,000 to their present figure:

The New Long Island City—Proviseions of the Proposed Charter.

The proposed city on Long Island, for which a charter has been prepared, comprises the following villages situated in the town of Newtown: Hunter's Point, Blissville, Laurel Hill, Astoria, Dutch Kills and Ravenswood. The charter provides for five wards—the First to comprise Hunter's Point; the Second, Blissville, Laurel Hill and a part of Dutch Kills; the Third, Ravenswood and a part of Dutch Kills; the Fourth, a portion of Astoria and the remainder of Dutch Kills; and the Fifth, the remainder portion of Astoria.

The Room ADV to consist of a Mayor, three Assessors, one Collector, a Treasurer, a Recorder, two Justices of the Peace and two Constables—all to be chosen by the city at large.

Each ward will elect two Aldermen and one Supervisor. One Marshal, one Superintendent of Streets, one Clerk, and one Sealer of Weights will also be appointed from each ward. The Mayor, Recorder and Treasurer constitute the Water Commissioners. The charter provides for a Fire Department, with a Chief and two As-

LOCAL NEWS IN BRIEF.

NEW-YORK.

A warrant was issued in the United States Commissioner's office, on Friday, against Captain E. B. Peabody, charged with treating Samuel Wehrey and William Joy, of the ship Neptune, in a cruel manner during a recent voyage of the vessel from Liverpool to this port. Yesterday, the accused, on learning that criminal action had been taken against him, voluntarily appeared before Commissioner Shields and gave bail. His examination will take place next week.

Commissioner Weite was yesterday for the purpose of hearing further evidence in the case of Samuel Fenn, charged with having bribed Policeman Crawford not to appear as a Government witness in the alleged Diamond counterfeiting case. Crawford was placed on the stand, but Mr. Evarts, defendant's counsel, declined to cross-examine him in regard to the alleged bribery. The charge was instantly dismissed.

The frauds alleged to have been committed by E. B. Fairbrother whilst acting as Assessor in the Thirty-second District, were again under investigation in the United States Commissioner's office, yesterday. Testimony in regard to the returns was given by W. H. Harvey, Thomas Cummins and R. W. Gouge. Neither of the witnesses was able to swear positively that the signatures on the returns were made by the defendant. The case was subsequently adjourned until the 20th inst.

Dr. Colton lectured last evening at the Cooper Institute, before a very large audience, on the subject of "Laughing Gas." He briefly described its nature and composition, showing that it was perfectly harmless, and spoke of the valuable assistance it had rendered dentists in the extraction of teeth, illustrating its power by experiments on himself and others. The lecture was highly interesting, and the latter portion convulsed the audience with laughter.

The steamship Tybee, which arrived at this port yesterday from San Domingo, brought the following passengers: Captain Smith, late of the bark Corrie Hill, which, on the way from Cardiff to Mobile, was wrecked off Saona Island; one of the crew (Cook) and a Mr. Reid Wolfe, who was a passenger on the same vessel; S. C. Garcia, Esq., Consul-General of Uruguay, and Captain Lawrence, of the steamship Eagle.

The bark Montreal, recently arrived here from Liverpool, is the first vessel that has brought a cargo of merchandise to connect with the steamship lines now running between San Domingo and this port. The practice hitherto has been for vessels from England to take their cargoes to St. Thomas in transit.

A merchant named H. E. Merrick, doing business in Broad-street, was brought before Commissioner Shields, yesterday, on a warrant issued against him by Commissioner Newton, in which he was charged with having unlawfully sold a mortgage belonging to the United States. He gave bail to appear for examination.

A colored man named Thomas Charles was sent to the Penitentiary for six months by Justice Dowling in the Court of Special Sessions, yesterday, for stealing an overcoat from Hewlett Thompson, proprietor of a boarding house in Catharine-street, with a slung shot.

The following sudden deaths were reported to the Coroners yesterday: Edward Cassely, who fell dead while at work on the new boulevard, near Seventieth-street; Mary Leahey, No. 760 Ninth-avenue; Mary Miller, No. 8 Well-street. The dead body of an infant was picked up in the Thirteenth Ward.

Thos. E. Dillon, dealer in nautical instruments and philosophical, dropped dead in his store, No. 74 Wall-street, from disease of Prostrate Dyspepsia, on India Wharf, Atlantic Dock. The attempt to capture the depredators being futile for want of help, they escaped.

The house No. 43 Willoughby-street, at present unoccupied, was entered yesterday morning by thieves who cut out all the lead pipe and carried it away. There are numerous houses poorly watched, awaiting the same fate, and seeming to invite it.

Rev. Theodore Cuyler, D. D., will preach in the Lafayette-avenue Presbyterian Church this evening on "Dress in the Drum Shop."

The reception of the Thirteenth Regiment will take place at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening.

The Supreme Court General Term have rendered a decision denying the motion for a new trial in the case of Owen Hand, now in jail under sentence of death for the murder of James O'Donnell. In the South Brooklyn gashouse in August last. Unless an appeal is taken against that decision, the sentence of the Court of Oyer and Terminer will be carried into effect.

Albert Bigarton, a baker, suspected of being implicated with Shannon, Curtis and Anderson in the robbery of dry goods which the Police found in a stable in Gowanus, was arrested yesterday and held to await examination.

The Police made 330 arrests last week.

LONG ISLAND.

The West Hampton Lodge of I. O. of G. T. have installed the following officers for the ensuing term: D. Rogers, W. C. T.; Chas. Raynor, W. S.; Geo. Raynor, W. F. S.; Miss S. Culver, W. P.; C. R. Raynor, W. M.; Geo. Conking, W. J. G.; D. Ketchum, W. O. G.; M. Raynor, W. C.; H. Bishop, W. A. S.; Mrs. A. Bishop, W. D. M.; Miss A. C. Ayers, W. R. S.; Mrs. H. Wines, W. L. S.; H. Raynor, R. W. C. E.

The adjourned trial of Mr. W. H. Nimmo took place yesterday at the Court House, Flushing, before Justices Parsons and McKenna. The examination was finished, and also the summing up of counsel, but the decision was reserved. It seems from the testimony that Thomas Lawrence acted as one of the inspectors of the election in question, and Mr. Lincoln and the prisoner acted as canvassers. All the witnesses agree that the tally was correctly made, and Mr. Lawrence, the inspector, and a Mr. Phillips counted the columns against Mr. Fogarty's and Mr. Parsons' names, both agreeing that the first-named gentleman had the largest number. The tally list was given to Mr. Nimmo, who, as Village Clerk, was the proper custodian of the ballots. The next evening Mr. Nimmo, while adding the columns, discovered that the result was incorrect, that a mistake of ten in favor of Fogarty had been made. This would reverse the supposed result of the election, and Mr. Parsons instead of Fogarty would be elected Trustee. Being satisfied that Mr. Lawrence had said to him that he saw that a mistake had been made, but as the result had been made known, to correct the error would damage his interest in the coming election.

The religious revivals at Sag Harbor, Yaphank and Patchogue are still in progress, and a large number of conversions reported daily. On last Sunday fourteen persons were baptized and forty-five taken in membership at the Presbyterian Church in Sag Harbor. Over 100 conversions are reported at Patchogue.

Yesterday afternoon Rev. Oscar Ritter, the pastor of Zion Church, of Flushing, was arrested on complaint of Miss Helen Seaman, a blooming colored damsel of about twenty Summers, who alleges that the reverend gentleman made an indecent assault upon her person, with intent to commit a rape.

To-morrow evening a taxpayers' meeting is to be held at Flushing, for which the following is the purpose according to the call: "To devise means to stem the flood, present and prospective, under which our rights, already imperiled, are likely to disappear, and the remnants of our property to vanish. It is called, in two words, to devise effective measures to secure immunity for the past and guarantees for the future."

The Glen Cove Gazette threatens to secede if the Court House of Queens County is located in any of the eastern towns, and insists that a geographical centre should again be tried. In the meantime Mineola, as embryo village, is the choice. In this village is located three gin mills, a store and a half dozen houses. It is reported that a map of the village is about to be submitted for.

On Monday last, the smack George Rogers, of Greenport, while halibut fishing on St. George's Bank, lost a boat containing two men, named Dennis Conris and William Kane. The men may have been picked up by some passing vessel and may yet be heard from. Conris is a native of Greenport and has a family, and Kane lives in Connecticut.

The officers of the General Lodge I. O. of O. F. of the State of New-York, will make an official visit to Freible Lodge No. 8, of Flushing, on Monday evening, the 21st inst. The Grand Officers will be accompanied by a number of prominent members of the Order, and Astoria Lodge will also assist in the reception.

On Wednesday morning, Dr. Charles Jewett, under the direction of the Grand Lodge of the Sons of Temperance of the State, delivered a lecture at the Congregationalist Church, Patchogue, on "Temperance." At the termination of the lecture, the choir of the Church entertained the audience with a number of popular melodies, among them a song entitled "Don't Marry a Man If he Drinks."

A convention of the Divisions of Sons of Temperance for Suffolk County, met at Patchogue on Tuesday, the 15th inst., D. D. G. W. Patterson Simmons, of New-York, President. Supreme Missionary, S. W. F. of the Eastern Divisions of New-York State, was present, and delivered an address. Twenty-three Divisions were represented by seventy-five delegates. The Convention was a very successful one. Many important resolutions were discussed and adopted, and a general interchange of views was had.

The name of the village of Clay Pitts has been changed to Fairview. An effort is being made to establish a Post Office.

On Thursday the German Cabinet Makers' Co-operative Lee Association (to the number of about 300, accompanied by a band of music) visited Astoria, and performed the ceremony of laying the corner stone of their building on the night of their recent purchase. Much good feeling prevailed, and the object of their visit was accomplished under most favorable auspices.

A number of regulated prostitutes broke up a dance, but were speedily quieted, and, however, some of their number are nearly blind by a beating which some parties inflicted on them. It is stated that at his late visit to Sag Harbor, Mr. Beecher's Peaches are not mentioned for his recovery.

Captain Wickham S. Havens, of Sag Harbor, has been recently reappointed Collector of that port.

The bail for Thomas Brennan, one of the Queens County ruffians who lately robbed Mr. Jeffreys, on the bridge near Flushing, has been fixed at $5,000. It is understood that his friends will come forward with the amount and release him from the County Jail.

On Monday the 26th inst., the Queens County Civil Court and Court of Sessions will convene at the Court House, North Hempstead. Hon. John J. Armstrong, County Judge, assisted by Justices Rushmore and Franklin, will preside.

A telegraph is to be built from Huntington to connect with the line of the Long Island Railroad Company.

Miss Charlotte Kelsey, of Hyde Park, who is the owner of 600 acres of land near that place, has donated to the Long Island Railroad Company a site for a new depot adjoining Mr. Stewart's recent purchase. It is reported that the Railroad Company will build a depot at that place.

WESTCHESTER COUNTY.

William Berwick, a resident of Yonkers, about 40 years old, was committed to the County Jail on Friday evening on a charge of incest, preferred against him by his wife, the second having, it is alleged, debauched his own daughter in 1866, when only 9 years old, and continued his incestuous intercourse since that time. Through fear of her father, the girl never told her mother of what had occurred; but on Friday Mrs. Berwick caught her husband in an attempt to repeat the offence while he was in a state of intoxication, and caused his arrest.

Coroner Batchgate, of Melrose, held an inquest yesterday upon the body of Mrs. Hall, who came to her death by injuries received by being pushed under the platform at the Melrose Station of the Harlem Railroad by a locomotive at a downtown-train-of-cars, which she, being aged and infirm, and was attempting to get upon the platform in order to go on board the train, but failed. It was thought at the time that she was not much hurt, but it was subsequently discovered that three of her ribs were broken and that she had received internal injuries. A verdict of accidental death was rendered.

A violent storm of rain, accompanied by thunder and lightning, prevailed in the vicinity of Cornwall all Friday night and all day yesterday. A strong southwest wind prevailed, and quite a flood was experienced.

NEW-JERSEY.

The hatters of Orange have organized a strike, not for higher wages, but for the purpose of breaking up an association of their employers, whose rules they regard as oppressive and unjust. One of these regulations, of which they complaint most, binds each manufacturer to refuse to employ any man who has been discharged from another shop in the city. It is stated that one thousand men and women are out of employment, at a daily loss to themselves of $4,000.

Miss Mary Morgan will lecture in Lyceum Hall, Hoboken, on next Thursday evening, for the benefit of the Franklin Lyceum Free Library. Her subject will be "Italy," on one of which she is reported to be competent to speak, having at one time held the office of "Equerry and Lord High Chamberlain" to Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy.

The annual session of the Newark Methodist Conference, which embraces nearly one-half of New-Jersey, Staten Island, and portions of New-York and Pennsylvania, will commence in Jersey City on the 26th of March. The New-Jersey Methodist Conference will hold its session about the same time at Long Branch, and it is reported will meet its sister Union in Jersey City, looking to a consolidation of both bodies, which divided in 1837. Five hundred clergymen are expected to participate in the reunion, and very important deliberations are anticipated.

An old and respected citizen of Jersey City, David Benford, died yesterday morning. He was taken sick the Sunday before last, and up to the time of his decease was a Justice of the Peace of the Fourth Ward.

A bogus Prussian Count has lately turned up in Elizabeth, and, after winning the affections of a wealthy young lady, and getting possession of her person and property, has left for parts unknown, taking the property, but leaving behind the afflicted bride.

The will of the late John H. Stevens was admitted to probate in Newark yesterday afternoon. The will disposes of property to the amount of $1,000,000. It bequeaths $600 to the Newark Orphan Asylum and $600 to All Saints' Memorial Church.

A deck hand of one of the Jersey City ferries, named Charles McCarthy, has been presented by the Life Saving Benevolent Association of New-York with a silver medal and $15, as a reward for his heroism in rescuing little Ida named Louisa Douglas Hammersmith, who fell overboard.

The Erie Railway Company have reinstated some of the strikers.

REMOVING THE CONCRETE.

The New York Pavilion and the Paris Asphalte—The Difference between the Pavement and the Pasco—How to Get the Genuine Concrete.

The threatening indictment which has been for some time impending over the Fifth-avenue nuisance has had a wonderful effect. Already the vile paste which has so long disfigured that splendid thoroughfare, and transformed it into one of the most disgusting and intolerable sloughs in the City, has been scraped from the honest pavement below, from Washington-square to Thirty-third-street, with the exception of the two blocks between Fourteenth and Sixteenth streets, which have been left to the last for the particular delectation of the guests at Delmonico's, and the frequenters of the fashionable club houses in that neighborhood. Two gangs of men have been at work during the greater part of the past week, one numbering about one hundred men, who with pickaxe and shovel tear up and cart away the filthy stuff, and the other of about twenty-five men, who scrape off the adhering paste from the stones. Loads of this precious compound are dumped at the foot of Twenty-third and Fourteenth streets, to be taken away with the other offal of the City. Its putting down and taking up has cost the people at least $10 the square yard. We might have had the avenue covered with silk velvet at less expense, and it would have answered all the purposes of a pavement just as well, and given nobody the consumption. The street is left in a much worse condition than before, many inequalities having been made in fitting the Corporation plaster to the crosswalks and sewer entrances.

Some persons have been under the delusion that this abominable stuff which has been plastered over the stone pavement of Fifth-Avenue, is identical with the asphalt which has been used with so much success on the streets of Paris. This is entirely a mistake, the fact being that the two substances bear no resemblance to each other, either in their ingredients or in the methods by which they are prepared for paving purposes.

The asphalt pavement used in Paris is formed of a bituminous limestone rock quarried in the Jura Mountains, which when crushed and exposed to a certain degree of heat disintegrates and forms a fine powder. This powder is again heated and spread on the street surface. Being compacted by hot rollers and allowed to cool it reintegrates, forming a surface of limestone rock in its original state. It is therefore a natural product of the quarry and not an artificial compound. The bituminous sidewalks of Paris are made of a compound of gravel and coal tar, somewhat similar to that used in the experiments here, but they are not intended for the wear and tear of heavy travel.

The interesting quality of the asphaltic rock of France, which gives into great value as a paving material, depends upon the natural bitumen in its composition, and varies with the proportion in which this substance is present. That does not make the hardest roads, however, which is richest in bitumen, but that in which the grains of native limestone are coated with the minimum of the cementing material.

Bituminous limestone is found in various localities in the United States, but experiment has not shown that its possesses the requisite qualities of readily disintegrating and of reforming with its original compactness when spread over the surface to be paved. The discovery of asphaltic rock with this peculiarity is greatly to be desired. The geological position of these deposits in France is in the upper Jurassic formation, next to the lower cretaceous, with a great sand stone immediately above. These contiguous formations are not found at all on our Atlantic coast, but the Jurassic rocks have been identified in the Black Hills of Dakota, the Laramie Mountains, in the flanks of the Rocky Mountain range, and on the headwaters of the Missouri. The lower cretaceous formation is also found in Dakota, Kansas and the Rocky Mountain region. It may be, therefore, that the true asphaltic rock is yet to be discovered in the Western States or Territories. If so, it will be the product of billions, and may add another element of wealth to the country. Many of the asphaltic rocks of Europe are of no value for paving purposes, and it is a matter of great importance that the genuine article should be secured. Any formation which may be found with properties identical with those of the Jura Mountains will assuredly bring a fortune with it, and will assure a company formed for its exploitation of success. The subject would be a fit one for the Legislature of New-York, and if properly investigated, the result would be to give it the proper degree of local pride in it upon the surface to be covered. The passion of someone convinced in this direction might be the means of adding to the City a new source of wealth, and one by the influence which it would exert in the direction of public improvements of such enormous expenditure as we have now and shall for years to come, would be more than equal to the gain of a gold mine.

DEATH BY ABORTION.

A Case in Brooklyn—The Professional Perpetrator Unknown—Coroner's Inquest.

Of the many cases of death which result from abortions in the City of Brooklyn, as well as elsewhere, very few ever come to the public notice. One, however, differing very little from most cases of the same kind has come to the surface through the Coroner's office. The person in this case was Mary Donegan, a young unmarried woman, 22 years of age, a native of Haverstraw, who died at the house of Mrs. Bridget Dillon, No. 164 Nassau-street, on the 8th inst. This last fact indicates how carefully the case has been withheld from the public by the Coroner, probably in the hope of being able to lay hands on the abortionist. The facts in the case are best set forth in the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before the Coroner:

Bridget Dillon testified as follows: Became acquainted with the deceased about three weeks ago at Haverstraw; she came to my house the week after last Monday afternoon; she looked sickly and did not complain; the following Friday she complained of being very sick; she went to her room; I left her about eleven o'clock that night and a few minutes afterwards heard her vomiting; she said that the brandy had made her sick; did not see her again till twelve o'clock the next day, when she was in bed, and said she would be up in a minute; she looked very bad and said she had been up several times during the night, but felt so weak; asked to empty her chamber, but she said, "No, I've had a baby and it is in there; my mother sent me down to Margaret Farrell's, but she wouldn't keep me, so I thought I would come to you." I went to get at the room, but she said, "Don't, for fear there; she said that she had taken a bottle of medicine which brought on her sickness; that she got the medicine from a doctor and paid $5 for it; that she had thrown the bottle in the yard; she said she did not tell who the doctor was; she said she had taken the medicine about two or three weeks before, and had not felt life in the child since then; she said she had told the father of the child; she said the old lady, who I thought was Margaret Farrell, came in and we sent for Mary; asked what we could do with the child, and the old lady said if we had a little box we could bury it; I went to get a box out of the hallway, leaving the old lady in the room; when I came back the women was gone and the child also; have not seen her since; Mary said she (the old woman) had taken away the child and burned it; the child was a pretty large one, and Mary said she had been pregnant about eight months; on Monday following she was up and dressed, and came down to breakfast by will; she complained of pain in her side; o'clock, with my help, and was quite sick during the night, complaining of pain in her stomach and bowels on Wednesday. I gave her a dose of castor oil; she was quite easy; I went for Mr. Williams, a druggist; told him that I wanted Mr. Williams to see something; he gave me some powders; gave her one every hour; she complained that they made her worse and blistered her mouth; I went to Mr. Williams and told him that I do not know if she got any; Williams he closed his store; sent one of my girls to tell him that she would take no more because they made her worse; he sent another; she said she had to go to see a doctor; I told her she seemed to be very bad all night, and declined to see either a doctor or a priest; sent my daughter for a priest in the morning; he came, and left for Dr. Behan; when she heard that she was dangerously sick; she died on Sunday morning.

Margaret Farrell, testified as follows: I live at No. 34 Prince-street, Brooklyn; the deceased came to my house about the middle of last December; she said she was married; had no room for her at her father's; knew nothing of the circumstances that caused her death; do not know who took the child away.

Alfred E. Hanson, M. D., testified as follows: I am a regular practicing physician and surgeon; reside at No. 28 Bridge-street, Brooklyn; was called to attend a woman at the house of Mrs. Dillon, on Nassau-street, on the 8th inst.; found the woman lying in a bed in the front room, suffering from inflammation of the vomit and the covering of the bowels; she said she was a married woman; she had been pregnant; produced by her falling down stairs; that she had a miscarriage on the previous Friday; prescribed for her and called again on Saturday when she acknowledged that she was not married; she said she had met a female doctor; she was very feeble; no signs of lacteation could be detected; the features of the womb exhibited the appearance of having been lately emptied; died prior to death; the interior surface of its neck was gangrenous; in my opinion the immediate cause of death was metro peritonitis.

The jury rendered the following verdict: That the deceased came to her death from a mortal wound, inflicted by some person or persons to the jury unknown.

Episcopal Churches in Morrisania.

The Episcopalians have now four houses of worship in the township of Morrisania, viz., St. Ann's, at Wilton, (or old Morrisania,) St. Paul's, on Fordham-avenue, near Eighth-street, St. Mary's, in Mott Haven, and Trinity, in George-street, Bronx, all apparently in a prosperous condition. About two years ago a number of the members of St. Paul's Church withdrew and, with the consent of Bishop Potter, organized Trinity parish, and for a short time Rev. Dr. Eucknoodt, of New-York, supplied the pulpit. On May 1, 1868, Rev. N. H. Chamberlin, who had accepted a call from the parish, assumed the duties of rector, and since that time the congregation had steadily increased in numbers and means and purchased six city lots of ground on George-street, near Broadway, or Boston road, as a site for a new house of worship for their accommodation. Within the last six months, substantial stone walls three feet thick have been built, as the future basement story of a handsome edifice of the Elizabethan style of architecture. In order to use the basement for the meeting of the congregation, these walls have been covered with a roof of appropriate design, and the interior, fitted up with seats, altar, &c., presents a very neat appearance. The roof is so arranged that the walls of the church edifice can be erected to their intended height without any impediment to the work or interruption to public worship. The church, as thus temporarily fitted up, was opened on Sunday last for public worship, but there can be no consecration of the building until it can be declared free from incumbrance, according to the rules of the Episcopalians. The church is finely situated on high ground, commanding a view of Long Island Sound. It will accommodate from 500 to 1,000 persons with sittings. It is well attended, and although the congregation is by no means a wealthy one, a very liberal spirit has been displayed, and about 200 scholars attend the Sabbath School connected with the church. The edifice as now finished, and the ground, have cost about $12,000. When completed according to the original plans, the cost will probably exceed $40,000.

The Funeral of Colonel Geo. E. Warren.

The funeral of Colonel George E. Farmer, late of the Sixth New-York Cavalry, took place yesterday morning at the residence of his uncle, George T. Jackson, Esq., No. 128 East Twenty-sixth-street. There was a large attendance of the relatives and friends of the deceased, and the services, conducted by Rev. Dr. Allan, of the M. E. Church, were very solemn and impressive. Rev. Drs. De Witt, Tyng and Chambers also took part in the exercises, and among the persons present were General Pleasonton, Cochrane and Farnsworth, and Col. Fairchild, Grangers and Trumbull. The remains were subsequently to Greenwood Cemetery by Post Hall Kearney, No. 8, G. A. R., and the Atlantic Lodge of Masons, as well as by the large circle of friends and relatives of the deceased. The casket was of rosewood, and bore the inscription: "George E. Farmer, died Feb. 16, 1869, aged 30 years." The following gentlemen acted as pall bearers: Colonel Hermann, Major Edwards, Major Parker, and Captains Crooker, Wheeler and Aiken.

The Moral Deliverance of Mankind—A Lecture by Mrs. H. F. Wendt.

Mrs. Mathilda F. Wendt, editor of the Neue Welt, the German woman's rights paper of this City, delivered an elaborate and interesting lecture on the "Moral Deliverance of Mankind," before the German Reading Club, at No. 208 Third-avenue, last night. She argued that the moral deliverance of mankind would be achieved by women's rights—that is, her political and social equality with man. She said that no theoretical arguments could be brought to bear against women's rights, and that the arguments brought forward to show that woman's suffrage was impracticable were unsound. She enumerated the several arguments, and endeavored to refute them in a very able manner. She claimed that every woman ought to be entitled and enabled to support herself by her own work, so that she may not be compelled to marry for the purpose of being supported by her husband. The advocates of entire equal rights for women in the family, the State and in society, were aiming at the moral perfection and bodily improvement of the human race. By women's rights intellectual progress would be secured. The struggle for these rights was a holy and sublime one. She believes coming generations would look back on the present generation as the last of the barbarians. The lecture was listened to with the closest attention by a large audience, and was received with applause.

Annual Meeting of the Board of Education.

The General Committee of the Grammar School Association of this City held their regular monthly meeting at Mechanics' Hall, Nos. 21 to 25 East Fourth-street, last evening. Mr. Francis V. Brunet presided. On the recommendation of the Sub-Committee on Correspondence of the Executive Committee, it was resolved to notify the Presidents of the several German-American naval school clubs of the passage of the following by-law by the Board of Education: "To authorize the Trustees in any ward, whenever a sufficient number of parents or guardians shall desire it, to introduce the study of the German language, as a part of the regular course of studies of the grammar schools and of the supplementary classes," and to appeal to them to have in their respective wards petitions circulated and signed, by the Boards of School Trustees for introduction of the German language as a regular branch of instruction in the public schools. The meeting then adjourned.

A Home for Our Veterans—A Movement on Foot to Provide for Needy Soldiers.

It has been for some time the reproach of our State that it has provided no home for the care and maintenance of its disabled soldiers. An institution of the kind existed at Albany a year ago, but the appropriation necessary for its support was refused by the Legislature, and the doors of the asylum were closed. One of the results is that our veteran soldiers are now under the charge of the Commissioners of Public Charities and Correction.

A meeting is to be held to-morrow evening at the Cooper Institute to urge upon the Legislature the passage of a law organizing a Soldiers' Home for disabled and needy veterans. Addresses will be delivered by Chief Justice Chase, Judge Dale, Henry Ward Beecher, Rev. Joe. P. Thompson and Stewart L. Woodford. The movement has received the hearty commendation of President Grant, Governor Hoffman and other prominent men, and it is expected that General Sherman and Sheridan will be present at the meeting. The letter of Sherman, written that if he can be in the City he will certainly be there.

The Female Students at Bellevue Hospital.

All the trouble between the male and female students at Bellevue Hospital appears to have ceased, and the ladies attend the lectures, both clinical and general, without experiencing any annoyance. As the clinics, when delicate subjects have to be demonstrated, the ladies are excluded, it is stated that all the trouble originated with two or three students, and that the majority have no feeling in the matter whatever, believing that the idea of females becoming general practitioners is preposterous, and that in a very short time no more female students will appear at Bellevue or any other hospital. At some of the lectures as many as twenty ladies have been present. At this season of the year, however, the lectures are generally thinly attended both by male and female students. Yesterday there were not more than a dozen persons present.
